Field v. Field, 215 Ill. 496, 74 NE 443. Whether a case would be made where interest would be allowable appeal from the allotment.[93] The widow is not entitled to a homestead and a year's support where the aggregate of the two provisions exceed the amount which may be set apart as a homestead and exemption.[94] Under a statute providing for an allowance for the support of the widow "and her family" and defining the word family as including every child "who was residing with the deceased at his death and whose age did not then exceed fifteen years" it has been held that the allowance should be based upon the number of children under fifteen residing with the widow at the time of the death of the husband, although one of such children died before the application for an allowance was filed.[95] It has been held that money received by the widow and minor children from benevolent societies of which decedent was a member, and due to his family at his death, should be deducted from the amount allowed by law;[96] and that the statute does not contemplate that the widow shall live at the homestead and consume the provisions belonging to the estate and have a year's support also allowed, but that when she applies for an assignment of a year's support she must be charged with the value of what she has previously consumed.[97] A statute providing that the widow shall receive real estate of the market value of five thousand dollars does not entitle her to such quantity of real estate as will produce for her an income of six per cent per annum on five thousand dollars over and above expenses.[98] A widow has been held properly chargeable with interest on sums of money given to her over and above what she was entitled to for allowance during the settlement of the estate.[99]

In case the property is sold for an amount sufficient to pay all the allowances to which a surviving husband is entitled, he has a right to the full amount of such allowances, although the property was appraised at less than the amount thereof.[1]

Effect of testamentary provision. A widow to whom an allowance for a year has been made pursuant to statute has been held not entitled to claim, in addition thereto, the income of the real and personal property during the period of the allowance, by virtue of a provision of the will giving her the use of all of testator's real and personal property for life.[2]

Sustenance during quarantine covers no more than the supplies left on the homestead during the widow's quarantine,[3] or her reasonable board during the same period,[4] and does not embrace the widow's mourning outfit [5] or any expenses to attend the funeral of her husband.[6] Neither is a widow who is in good health, except that she is worried on account of wrongdoing in respect to testator's estate, entitled to a nurse as a part of her reasonable sustenance.[7]

[§ 778] 2. Matters to Be Considered in Fixing Amount—a. In General. The allowance should be reasonable in amount,[8] and the reasonableness depends, of course, upon the circumstances of each particular case.[9] In fixing the amount it is proper to consider the social station and wants of the widow and children, and the degree and estate of the husband at the time of his death,[10] giving due on a widow's award after the approval of her selection and election by the court is not presented for decision").

The number of children residing in the family at the death of the intestate, according to the report of the commissioners, was two. The amount of the allotment was fixed by the statute and was personal to the widow. How necessary must it have been to her then, when the death of her husband was followed probably by the sickness, and soon by the death, of one of the children—this sad event, we may well presume, entailing more of expense and of immediate necessity upon her than the amount of the allowance to her on account of the child!").

regard to the widow's private estate not received from her husband.[11] It is also proper to take into consideration the value and financial condition of the estate,[12] and this has been deemed a factor of more importance than the situation of the family,[13] although, on the other hand, it has been said that the reasonableness of allowances to the widow from the estate of the deceased husband is not affected by the question whether the estate will ever be sufficient to pay them.[14] Funds paid out of a solvent estate by order of court to the widow and minor children, for their support during its settlement, need not be repaid because the administrator has lost money in the management of a business owned by the estate, so as to render the estate insolvent, or as a condition precedent to holding realty, not connected with the losing business, free from trade debts incurred therein.[15]

This will involve an inquiry, among other matters, into their habits and mode of life during the lifetime of the decedent; the requirements of the several members of the family—depending upon their age and condition—whether for education, physical support, or health, and also the condition and extent of the property belonging to the estate." "The extent of that allowance must be determined primarily by the value of the estate. Due, but not controlling, regard should be had as to the situation in life and previous manner of living of the widow or children, for family expenditures must be adapted to the resources of the estate. It would be gross injustice to permit such an allowance to confiscate the estate, and in effect rob its creditors. Accordingly, where as in this case, the claim is made that the estate is insolvent the allowance should be made with proper reference to the facts, as far as the same can be ascertained, without undertaking to finally adjudicate either the value of the property or the validity of the claims." [b] Construction of statutes.—(1) A statute giving to the widow and children, as exempt, "the clothing of the family, the clothes of the widow, and her ornaments proper for her station," does not give to the widow the right to have the wearing apparel and ornaments of her deceased husband set off to her. Matter of Griffith, 49 Misc. 405, 100 NYS 215. (2) Nor is the husband, under a provision that in case his wife dies "the same articles and personal property" shall be set apart to him, entitled to the wife's clothing and ornaments. Matter of Whiting, 19 Misc. 85, 43 NYS 969.

[c] The term "household furniture" has been held to include: (1) a piano (Matter of Allen, 36 Misc. 398, 72 NYS 750), (2) used as a means of support by the widow and minor children of decedent (Phillips v. Phillips, 151 Ala. 527, 44 S 391, 125 AmSR 40, 15 AnnCas 157). (3) A "silver card receiver used on hat rack." Phillips v. Phillips, supra. (4) But cows and other property of that class cannot, by the most liberal construction of the statute, be brought under the head of "household furniture." Matter of Griffin, 118 App. Div. 515, 103 NYS 345.

[d] The term "wearing apparel" has been held to include: (1) A watch and chain Chamboredon v. Fayet, 176 Ala. 211, 57 S 845. (2) A ring valued at twenty dollars and a watch and chain valued at thirty-five dollars. Phillips v. Phillips, 151 Ala. 527, 44 S 391, 125 AmSR 40, 15 Ann Cas 157. of such articles are wanting she usually is entitled to an allowance of money or other property in lieu thereof,[22] although this is sometimes denied.[23] Where, however, all the articles specified are on hand she is compelled to take them, and cannot have money or other property in lieu thereof, although the statute provides for an allowance of other property or money in lieu of articles not on hand;[24] and in such case she is entitled to nothing more in the way of exemptions, although the value of the property may be less than the amount designated by statute to be allowed in lieu of articles not on hand.[25] In the absence of an allegation that a gift inter vivos by intestate to his son was made with a view of committing a fraud against the rights of intestate's widow, or that it had that effect, she was not entitled to avoid the gift on the ground that she was prejudiced thereby, in that there was no property out of which to assign her the articles to which she was entitled by law, as exempt from distribution.[26] As to articles not exempted which the widow may keep or receive the general rule charging her with their value must apply.[27]

[§ 781] 4. When Whole Estate Set Apart. In some jurisdictions statutes have been enacted providing that in case the estate does not exceed a certain specified amount, there shall be no administration thereon, or if administration has commenced there shall be no further proceedings therein, but the whole shall be set apart to the widow or minor children;[28] and where it is made to appear that the value of the estate brings it within the statute, all of it must be so set apart regardless

Wood v. Robinson, 46 SW 23, 19 KyL 1659.

23. Stromberg v. Stromberg, 119 Minn. 325, 326, 138 NW 428 ("We are clear that the trial court was right in holding that, where a decedent left no household goods, the widow is not entitled to have any allowance in lieu thereof. If there be household goods, she is entitled to select and keep such to the value of $500, but the statute, section 3653, R. L. 1905, does not allow her to select an equivalent in other property. Her right to the selection of certain specified articles of her deceased husband's property is clearly confined to those articles, the household goods not to exceed a fixed value").

[a] In New York the cases are not in harmony. (1) The right to an allowance in lieu of specific articles was asserted in Matter of Baird, 126 App. Div. 439, 110 NYS 708; Matter of Williams, 31 App. Div. 617, 52 NYS 700, 28 NYCivProc 79 [foll Matter of Hulse, 41 Misc. 307, 84 NYS 220; In re Hembury, 37 Misc. 454, 75 NYS 933]; Matter of Bern, 52 Misc. 426, 103 NYS 167; Matter of Bidgood, 36 Misc. 516, 73 NYS 1061. (2) But it was denied in Baucus v. Stover, 24 Hun 109 [rev on other grounds 89 N. (3) An allowance in money or other property if the articles mentioned do not exist is now expressly prohibited by statute. Code Civ. Proc. § 2670.

[b] That the matter depends upon the provisions of the statute was the view of the court in Nelson v. Troll, 173 Mo. A. 51, 156 SW 16 (where a surviving husband was held entitled to an allowance for provisions not on hand because the statute provided that if they were not on hand "the court shall make a reasonable appropriation of the assets of the estate to supply such deficiency," but the court said with relation to wearing apparel, implements of industry, etc., that "plaintiff is not entitled to an allowance on account of such articles, unless they were owned by his wife at the time of her death, for the statute gives no allowance in lieu of them when it appears they are not on hand").

Linares v. Linares, 93 Tex. 84, 53 SW 579 [aff (Civ. A.) 51 SW 510].

[c] Whether the property is homestead or not, it all passes to the widow if it does not exceed the statutory allowance in amount or value. Headen v. Headen, 171 Ala. 521, 54 S 646.

[d] Statute applicable to separate estate of wife.—In re Leslie, 118 Cal. 72, 73, 50 P 29 ("We see no reason why the provisions of that section do not apply to the separate property of both the wife and husband equally with the community property. The section is broad in its terms, and in no way is it there indicated that community property only was in the mind of the legislature when this law was enacted. It refers in terms to the estate of any deceased person. There is no more reason why a small of whether the estate is solvent or insolvent.[29] In some jurisdictions the statutes to this effect are applicable only to personal property and not to realty,[30] but a court has allowed the widow of an intestate the whole of the personal estate, and directed the charges of administration to be deducted from the proceeds of real estate sold by order of court for the payment of the intestate's debts.[31] It has been held that an order or decree of the probate court is necessary to vest the property in the widow;[32] but it has also been considered that, where the estate does not exceed the specified amount, title vests absolutely in the widow by operation of law without any judicial allotment,[33] and that if the court fails to make an order setting apart the property the widow may, in a proceeding against her to account for the estate, show that it does not exceed the statutory amount and thus avail herself of the benefit of the statute.[34] Notice to all persons interested is sometimes required as a prerequisite to setting aside the entire estate to the widow.[35]

[§ 782] F. Persons Entitled—1. In General. The object of the statutes under discussion is to provide temporary support for those only who are dependent upon the deceased,[36] and the benefits of such a statute cannot be extended to persons who were not within the contemplation of the legislature.[37] While the word "family" as used in such statutes has been held to refer only to a surviving husband or wife or minor children,[38] it has also been considered that the term may embrace other persons who formed part of the domestic circle of decedent at the time of his death,[39] although it cannot be extended to mere boarders or lodgers.[40]

[§ 783] 2. Widow. The widow is invariably entitled to the benefit of the statutory provision for maintenance and support,[41] but in order to have the benefit of such a statute, she must have been lawfully married to decedent,[42] or at least have been living with him as his wife under an honest belief that she was lawfully married to him,[43] and must as a rule have been a member of his family at the time of his death.[44] The allowance to the widow is not ordinarily dependent upon there being any other family of decedent,[45] even though the separate estate of the deceased husband or wife should not be set apart to the minor children than there is why an estate of community property should not be set apart. The object and purpose is subserved in both cases. The reasons for taking the estate out of administration, and setting it aside to the minor children, are the same whatever may be the technical character of the property belonging to the estate").

[e] Settlement by probate judge; power of appointee.—Under a statute providing that when a person dies leaving no estate, except personal property of trifling value, the judge of the county court shall take charge of the estate personally, or by some person he may appoint, and pay out of it the burial and other expenses, and set apart to the widow and minor children, if any, the residue, the responsibility of gathering and distributing such property is on the judge, and a person appointed by him to take physical possession of the property is a mere custodian, and has not legal capacity to sue, as agent of the county court, to collect from a fraternal society of which deceased was a member a sum for funeral expenses. Smith v. Terry Peak Miners' Union, 16 S. D. 631, 94 NW 694.

[f] Abatement of proceedings.—Proceedings by a widow to have the whole of an estate set aside to her without administration abate on her death, where there are no minor children; and hence, where she dies pending an appeal from an order denying her application, the appeal will be dismissed. In re Bachelder, 123 Cal. 466, 56 P 97.

[g] Sale by husband before death.—Where a husband executed a bill of sale of his personal property immediately before his death, a decree of court setting aside the estate to the widow pursuant to a statute vesting it in her, when it does not exceed five hundred dollars, does not operate to divest title from the purchaser under the bill of sale, although possession of the property was not delivered until after the husband's death. Warner v. Warner, 30 Ind. A. 578, 66 NE 760.

[h] Right to sue on claim due decedent.—Where the personal property does not exceed the amount of the widow's exemption, she may maintain an action upon any claim due decedent. Lasseter v. Deas, 9 Ala. A. 564, 571, 63 S 735 (where it was said, however: "In determining the defendant's liability and the amount of his indebtedness to the deceased husband, the defendant would be entitled to plead and prove any legal set-off he might have to the demand sued upon, without regard to any exemption existing in favor of the widow to property belonging to her deceased husband at the time of his death, for her right of exemption could only pertain to the amount actually due from the defendant to her husband at the time of his death, and, in determining what that amount is, the defendant is entitled, when properly pleaded, to have taken into consideration any set-off to the demand sued upon that exists in his favor").

[i] Such a statute is not impliedly repealed by a subsequent act dealing with the right to select a homestead after the death of the husband. Scott v. Stark, 75 Wash. 610, 135 P 643.

[j] Statute repealed.—The act of Jan. 2, 1851, providing that, where the whole of a decedent's estate did not exceed in value three hundred dollars, it should be allowed to the widow, was repealed by the act of Dec. 8, 1852, commonly known as the "Homestead Act," in so far at least as regarded the homestead rights of the minor children conferred by the latter act. statute grants the allowance to widow and children,[46] although the existence of a family has the effect, under some statutes, of increasing the allowance.[47] The widow's right to the statutory allowance becomes vested upon the death of her husband, and is not dependent upon a demand by her.[48] It has been held that the property set apart to the widow does not become absolutely hers, and she has no right to sell the same and receive the proceeds to her own use, but that such property, when no longer needed or used by her, falls into the general estate, and is to be distributed according to law, although it is not liable for the debts of decedent.[49]

[§ 784] 3. Children—a. In General. Although under some statutes the allowance goes to the widow to the exclusion of the children,[50] the provision is generally made for the benefit of the children as well as the widow,[51] and if no lawful widow survives, or in case of her death, the allowance usually goes to decedent's surviving children, if any.[52] Minor children, or children not over a specified age, are the usual sole objects of such legislation, next to or in connection with the widow;[53] but some statutes embrace even adult children, provided they are actually in decedent's household and have a legal or moral right to be clothed and fed by the widow,[54] or out of decedent's estate,

[b] Children not residing with widow.—(1) Personal property of an intestate set apart by the statute as exempted from distribution is for the exclusive benefit of the widow, where there are no infant children of the intestate residing with her, infant children of the intestate not residing with the widow not being entitled to any part of the property thus set apart, or to any interest therein, although they be children by a former marriage, and have no natural mother. Alexander v. Alexander, 86 Ky. 688, 7 SW 156, 8 KyL 839. (2) Under the statute permitting a widow and minor children to occupy the dwelling house and adjacent fields, not exceeding forty acres, for one year from the death of the husband, free of rent, where the minor children are removed by their guardian, he cannot maintain an action against the widow to recover any part of the rental value of the premises for such year. [a] Widow cannot apply allowance to individual debts.—Where a year's support is set aside for the benefit of the widow and minor children, the widow cannot apply the proceeds thereof to the payment of her individual debt, since such application would deprive the children of their rights. Hill v. Van Duzer, 111 Ga. 867, 36 SE 966.

[b] Where the widow refused to assume the control and maintenance of two stepchildren under fifteen years of age for a year after the death of her husband, she was only entitled to an allowance of three hundred dollars, the allowance for the children being payable to their guardian. In re Stewart, 140 N. C. 28, 52 SE 255.

[c] A minor child who is not living with the widow is entitled to her share, since such right is given, not as an incident to the family relation, but because of minority. Ford v. Strong, (Ala.) 78 S 918; Lanford v. Lee, 119 Ala. 248, 24 S 578, 72 AmSR 914.

[d] Widow may waive her rights in favor of children.—Where the widow, having ample means of her own, gives her consent, the whole of the allowance may be assigned for the use and support of the minor children. In re Palomares, 63 Cal. 402.

[e] Rights in mother's estate.—Under some of the statutes the minor child of a widow is entitled to support out of her estate. See supra § 772.

[f] Residence of children.—Where a husband dies leaving a widow and minor children and only exempt property, the children, so long as the widow lives, have no right to the possession or disposition thereof unless and until they mature and leave the family, when they become entitled to their proportion of what remains. Kelley v. Kelley, 9 Ala. A. 306, 63 S 740 (therefore, where a husband left a widow and minor children and an estate consisting of less than one thousand dollars, an action on a note which was part of such estate, all of which was exempt to the widow and minor children, could only be brought by the widow alone and not by her and the minors).

[a] All female children, regardless of their ages, who reside with the widow, are entitled to the benefits where there is no widow.[55] Where after a year's support has been set apart to a widow for herself and a minor child, the child voluntarily removes from the residence of her mother and relinquishes further care and support by the mother, she cannot recover for her own separate use any part of the sum so set apart,[56] nor where an allowance has been made to the widow for the support of the family, should an additional allowance be made for the support of a child in the absence of special circumstances.[57]

[§ 785] b. Posthumous Children. A posthumous child is entitled to share in the statutory apportionment with the other children,[58] or the birth of a posthumous child may entitle the widow to the benefit of an additional allowance provided for in case there are children residing with the widow.[59]

[§ 786] c. Illegitimate Children. Illegitimate children are not, it has been held, entitled to an allowance for support out of their deceased father's estate.[60]

[§ 787] d. Children of Successive Marriages. Children of decedent by a former wife have been held to share in the allowance,[61] unless they do not reside with the widow.[62] It has been held that when the family embraces two sets of minor children by different wives each set is entitled to an allowance, and the portion going to each should be specified,[63] and also that an administrator on the joint estates of a deceased husband and his first wife cannot appropriate the entire allowance for the one year's support made by the court, although furnished from the community property of the first marriage, to the exclusive use of the children of the first marriage, if there are minor children of the deceased husband by a subsequent marriage.[64] The fact that mother remarried and left her second husband surviving does not affect the right of her children by her first husband in their father's estate.[65]

[§ 788] e. Stepchildren. A statute making provision for the widow "and her family" has been held to apply to children of the widow by a former husband, who are under age and reside with her,[66] and a similar construction has been placed upon a statute providing an allowance for "the children of the intestate, or of the widow, or of both."[67] But a statute providing that certain articles "shall be set apart to the widow or infant child or children," has been held to refer to the infant child or children of intestate and not to include his wife's infant children by a former marriage.[68]

[§ 789] f. Effect of Adoption. It has been held that where minor children, after their father's death, were adopted by other persons, they ceased to be of the family of their deceased father, and so were no longer within the benefit of statutes making provision for the family of deceased.[69]

[§ 790] 4. Grandchildren. It is usually held that grandchildren of decedent are not within the scope of statutes providing for the support of the family,[70] although it has also been considered grandchildren in necessitous circumstances may be permitted to share in the allowance.[71]

[§ 791] 5. Husband. Under some statutes a surviving husband is entitled to an allowance from the estate of his wife,[72] while under other such of the allowance. Gillett v. Gillett, 207 Ill. 136, 69 NE 942 [aff 109 Ill. A. 126 (the circumstances showed that a daughter was a member of the family and not a mere boarder, although she contributed to the household expenses, and such daughter was entitled to an allowance, although she possessed an independent fortune in her own right)].

[b] Married adult children possessed of means are not entitled to the statutory exemption from their father's estate. Steel's Est., 13 Phila. (Pa.) 398.

[a] A married adult daughter (1) dependent upon decedent for support may be entitled to the statutory allowance out of his estate. Wolford v. Deemer, 89 Ill. A. 524; Armstrong's Est., 2 Chest. Co. (Pa.) 496. (2) A married adult daughter not dependent but living with her parent is entitled to an allowance. Stevenson's Est., 23 Pa. Dist. 747; Hoffman's Est., 25 Pa. Co. 633. (3) A married daughter who was living with deceased at the time of his death is not entitled to an award, where she was intending to resume her marital relations and was in part supported by her husband. Evans v. Evans, 164 Ill. A. 614. To same effect Quick v. Patterson, 186 Ill. A. 223.

[b] Widowed daughter.—Under a statute providing that, where decedent was a householder and head of a family and left no widow, any children residing with him at his death shall receive the same allowance as is given to the widow, the facts that a daughter living with her widowed father at his death was an adult and a widow, that while her husband lived she did not live with her father, that she returned to her father's home at his request, that he paid her for her services, and that she owned property and had an income from other sources, and shared equally with her brothers and sisters under her father's will, do not defeat her right to an allowance under the statute. [b] Children taken away from widow after death of father.—Where children by a former wife, who were living in the household of their father at the time of his death, are afterward taken away against the widow's consent, it is error to direct any part of the allowance to be paid to their guardian. statutes no such allowance is made.[73]

[§ 792] 6. Nonresidents. While under some statutes the allowance may be granted to nonresident widows or children,[74] the allowance is more generally granted only to widows, children, or families resident within the state at the time of the decedent's death,[75] unless their nonresidence was caused by decedent's wrongful acts.[76]

Change of residence. A widow or child who was a resident of the state at the time of decedent's death does not lose the right to an allowance by a subsequent change of residence,[77] and, conversely, one who was a nonresident at the time of decedent's death cannot acquire the right to an allowance by subsequently becoming a resident of the state.[78]

Temporary absence of the widow from the state is not a relinquishment or waiver of her legal exemptions in her husband's estate,[79] nor does the fact that decedent died outside of the state defeat his widow's right to an allowance where his domicile, at the time of his death, was in the state.[80]

The fact that the husband's domicile was elsewhere has been held not to defeat the right of a widow who is a bona fide resident of the state.[81]

[§ 793] G. Property Subject to Allowance—1. In General. It has been considered that property set apart for the widow and children must be actually on hand or due,[82] and an allowance cannot be made for a certain recovery charged on the estate generally.[83]

[§ 794] 2. Personalty Generally. The statutory allowance comes from all personalty belonging unqualifiedly to decedent,[84] notwithstanding specific or general bequests elsewhere,[85] unless, of course, the statute limits the right to property not law-

[b] Circumstances not showing residence in state.—(1) Testator, dying within the state, had lived at the place of his decease for a number of years for business purposes, his family remaining in another state where they made their home. Testator often declared that he was only in the state temporarily, and that his home was in another state; and testator's wife, who visited him in his last illness, expressed the intention to take him back to the other state in case of his recovery. Testator had voted at one primary election in the state, and had been elected alderman, but had refused to serve. It was held that as the testator had never taken up his residence with the intention of making it his home, his widow was not entitled to the homestead exemptions or year's support allowed by law to residents of the state. Hascall v. Hafford, 107 Tenn. 355, 65 SW 423, 89 AmSR 952. [a] The term "personal property" as used in a statute providing that such parts of the personal property of a deceased person as the probate court may allow as necessaries to his widow for herself shall not be taken as assets for the payment of debts, legacies, or charges of administration, means the personal property left by decedent at the time of his death, as to which, on the appointment of a personal representative, the probate court acquired jurisdiction to allow to the widow as necessaries whatever she ought to receive. Taylor v. Whitcomb, 192 Mass. 555, 78 NE 536.

[b] Hay and corn matured and gathered before decedent's death is personalty. Peugh v. McKinney, (Mo. A.) 211 SW 83.

[c] Proceeds of property levied upon before the husband's death cannot be taken for the widow's exemption if the property was subject to attachment against the husband. Blake v. Durrell, 103 Ky. 600, 45 SW 883, 20 KyL 270.

[d] Personal property subject to a chattel mortgage, although duly appraised and set off to a widow by order of court, may be replevied by the mortgagee; but the widow may redeem it by paying the debt or probably obtain an order for the sale of the property and payment to her of the proceeds of such sale in excess of the debt. Recker v. Kilgore, 62 Ind. 10.

fully disposed of by the will of decedent.[86] But advancements made to children during a decedent's lifetime form no part of the estate and are not subject to be brought into hotchpot for the benefit of an allowance to the widow.[87]

[§ 795] 3. Undivided Interests. While it has been held that a decedent's unascertained share in an unliquidated fund which others share or control cannot be applied to the widow's allowance,[88] it has also been asserted that articles of personal property in which he had only an undivided one-half interest may be set off to the widow.[89]

[§ 796] 4. Partnership Property. It is generally held that the property of a partnership cannot be set aside for an allowance to the widow and children of a deceased partner,[90] although the residue or surplus, after the payment of partnership debts, is applicable for this purpose;[91] but there is also authority for the view that an allowance may be made to the widow of a surviving partner from the firm assets, as from his own personal estate,[92] even though the firm is insolvent.[93]

[§ 797] 5. Community Property. In a state where the community property system prevails[94] it has been held that either separate property of decedent or community property may be set apart for the widow's allowance.[95]

[§ 798] 6. Growing Crops. Crops growing on decedent's lands at the time of his death are usually regarded as being subject and applicable to the support of the surviving wife and children.[96]

[§ 799] 7. Proceeds of Life Insurance. That the proceeds of life insurance may be set aside for the widow's allowance has been both asserted[97] and denied.[98]

[§ 800] 8. Amount Recovered for Wrongful Death. A widow is not entitled to a statutory allowance out of an amount recovered for the wrongful death of decedent.[99]

It is given whether he dies 'testate or intestate;' and as it is not in his power to prevent her from demanding it, it is equally out of his power, as it is out of the power of the court, to interfere with her right to determine whether the amount to which she is entitled shall be made up, in whole or in part, of articles 'retained,' of cash, or of real estate," Gourley's Est., 11 Pa. "Administration of partnership estates being confided exclusively to the surviving partner, the county court has no control over partnership assets, and hence is without authority to set aside allowances to the widow and children from such assets, and can only do so out of any residue coming to the heirs or personal representatives after the payment of partnership debts. The estate of the deceased partner in such residue must be measured by the interest which the decedent, during his life, had in the partnership, the extent of which is ascertainable by reference to the articles between the partners. This opinion would be unduly extended by analyzing articles 2037 to 2062 of the Revised Statutes of the state, which provide for allowances to the widow and children of a decedent and regulate the procedure in reference thereto. But an examination of those articles will disclose that it is only the estate of the decedent out of which the allowance may be set aside—an estate which may be inventoried and appraised, and one which is under the control and supervision of the county court, and one which that court is authorized to sell—the individual estate of the decedent, and not an undefined and unascertainable interest in the partnership assets." under some statutes that the realty may be applied to the allowance for the widow and children, either equally with the personalty or whenever the latter proves insufficient,[1] under other statutes it is held that the allowance is payable from personalty only, and even though the personalty is insufficient to pay the full amount authorized by law, the deficiency cannot be supplied from real estate, or the surplus proceeds of a sale thereof.[2]

[§ 802] 10. Homestead. It has been held that the homestead cannot be resorted to to satisfy the allowance for support of the widow and children,[3] but in a case where a man took a homestead and died, leaving his wife as the only beneficiary thereof, his children having become of age, it was held that she could take a year's support out of the homestead.[4] It has also been held that, where a homestead has been set apart to the widow, the interest of decedent's heirs in remainder in such homestead is liable to be sold to pay a family allowance made in favor of the widow.[5]

"We are of opinion that a consideration of all of the sections of chapter 23 . . . (Comp. St. 1905), warrants the conclusion that the maintenance of the widow and minor children of a testator, pending the settlement of his estate, may be charged upon the real estate itself, if the income therefrom and the personal property be insufficient for the payment thereof and the other expenses of administering such estate. We have not overlooked Godman v. Converse, 43 Nebr. 463, 61 NW 756, but the court was there concerned solely with section 176, c. 23, supra, and the testator had explicitly restricted the widow to her bequest, which was generous, for her support." He devised his realty to his wife for life or widowhood, and on her death or marriage one half to the son if restored to sanity, and provided that the other half, on the wife's death or marriage before the restoration of the son to sanity, should be disposed of by the executor and the proceeds expended in endowing graves and erecting suitable monuments over testator and his wives and son. On testator's death his widow occupied the land until it was set aside to her as a year's support, which was done after the son's death. The judgment allowing the widow support in the land was not void on the theory that title had passed out of testator's estate at the time the support was assigned. Reynolds v. Norvell, 129 Ga. 512, 59 SE 299.

[d] Where decedent in his lifetime conveyed his property without being joined by his wife for the purpose of preventing her from receiving her just portion of his estate, the court may decree the widow a lien for her award on the real estate so conveyed by the husband. with the rule that such allowances are in the nature of administration expenses,[18] and can work no hardship where the statute permits the entire estate to be assigned to the widow and children without administration where it does not exceed a certain amount.[19] A widow is entitled to her statutory allowance before payment of the expenses of litigation by the administrator in an attempt to defeat her rights.[20] The widow's claim to an allowance out of decedent's share in partnership assets is postponed to partnership debts.[21]

[§ 805] 2. Mortgages and Pledges. Unless the widow relinquishes her claim to an allowance or exemption,[42] it is usually accorded priority over a mortgage created by decedent,[23] although an exception is sometimes recognized in the case of a mortgage given for purchase money.[24] The claim has not priority over a mortgage lien adhering to the title when decedent acquired it,[25] or a mortgage executed by the widow as executrix for money borrowed to be used in lieu of a family allowance.[26] The same distinction has been applied to a pledge;[27] and the widow's title under a judgment granting her a year's support has been held subservient to the title of the purchasers under a bill of sale executed by the husband to secure a note given as collateral for advancements for farm supplies and a bill of sale by the widow to secure advances.[28] A widow's right to a yearly allowance for herself and children, and in lieu of a homestead, has been held to be inferior to the claim of a bank on a life policy, delivered to it by decedent to secure a debt.[29]

[§ 806] 3. Mechanics' Liens. A mechanic's lien creditor is usually postponed to the widow's allowance.[30]

[§ 807] 4. Judgments. A judgment creditor, except for purchase money,[31] is usually postponed to the widow's allowance,[32] unless the judgment was obtained prior to the enactment of the statute granting the allowance and continued a lien until the husband's death.[33]

[§ 808] 5. Attachments and Executions. The widow's allowance usually takes precedence of all liens by attachment and execution.[34] This has been held to be true even with respect to property upon which a levy has been made,[35] but other cases assert that the attachment or execution is entitled to priority with respect to property levied on,[36] unless of course the property was exempt from levy under the statute.[37]

[a] Unencumbered property to be resorted to first.—The widow and minors have not an untrammelled choice as to the particular fund or property out of which they will satisfy their claim. They are restricted to the proceeds of unencumbered property, where there is enough of such, and, if not, must attack the junior mortgages before seeking payment at the expense of the older ones. And when the widow and minor children seek to appropriate all, or a portion of the proceeds of property specially mortgaged to the payment of their claim against a decedent's estate, the burden is on them to show the absence of other available property, not encumbered, or affected only by the younger mortgages. [§ 809] I. How Allowance Paid.[38] Where the allowance is for the sole benefit of the widow, it is not payable to any one else,[39] although if it is paid to her attorney, she in fact receives it by receiving credit on an amount previously advanced to her by him.[40] The widow is usually entitled to have her statutory allowance allotted to her in money,[41] but it may sometimes be allotted in notes payable to her deceased husband,[42] or a judgment on a note may be selected by the widow for her allowance.[43] If the widow claims her allowance in cash it must be taken usually either out of money actually in possession, or from the proceeds of stocks, bonds, loans, or other investments, or of indebtedness due decedent, when converted or reduced to money;[44] she cannot compel the legal representative to sell goods so as to give her the amount which is exempted to her by statute.[45]

Installments. It is held that the court may, in a proper case, direct the executor to pay to the widow, for the support of herself and children, a sum of money in quarterly installments, instead of setting apart for their support specific property, and it is not a valid objection to such order that the executor has not, at the time, enough money on hand to pay the first installment.[46]

[§ 810] J. Bar, Waiver, or Relinquishment—1. [a] The right is not released by (1) an antenuptial agreement whereby the wife agreed to accept a certain sum as all that she should "receive of the estate." In re Miller, 143 Iowa 120, 121 NW 700. (2) Neither does an antenuptial agreement providing that the wife, in consideration of a payment made and love and affection, "hereby agrees to release, and does release, all claim which upon the death of the first party, she as his widow may have in his estate, whether in right of dower or as her distributive share in the personalty, or otherwise, under the laws of this state," deprive the wife of her right to an allowance for maintenance. Fulling v. Durfee, 85 Mich. 34, 40, 48 NW 48 ("The agreement here was intended to bar relator's 'right of dower, and all of her right to share in the estate,' and cannot be extended to include statutory 'allowances pertaining to administration.' The claims referred to are those which she, as widow would be entitled to make at the time of the distribution of the estate"). (3) So also the right to a widow's award is not barred by an antenuptial contract by which the wife has agreed to accept whatever provision may be made for her by the will of her husband, followed by the acceptance by her of the provisions of such a will, where neither the contract nor the will provides for the relinquishment of the award. Pratz v. Pratz, 122 Ill. A. 101.

[b] The right is released by: (1) A contract not to claim as heir or survivor in the property of the husband. In re Yoell, 164 Cal. 540, 129 P 999. (2) A release of "all rights of dower, curtesy, or survivorship, as well as all other rights, either vested or inchoate, . . . which may be created or established by virtue of such marriage by the common law or any statute." Cowles v. Cowles, 74 Conn. 24, 25, 49 A 195. (3) A renunciation of all claims in law or equity of curtesy, dower, homestead, survivorship, or otherwise. Kroell v. Kroell, 219 Ill. 105, 76 NE 63, 4 Ann Cas 801. (4) A covenant not to sue for or demand any distributive share or interest as surviving spouse. Pavlicek v. Roessler, 222 Ill. 83, 78 NE 11 [rev 121 Ill. A. 219]. (5) A contract reciting that the woman releases "any and all claims." Buffington v. Buffington, 151 Ind. 200, 51 NE 328. (7) A marriage settlement assigning a life policy held by the intended husband to his intended wife in full satisfaction of any and all claims she might have in his estate, and wherein she covenanted that the settlement should be a bar both in law and in equity to any claim she might make to any part of the real or personal estate of her husband. Bright v. Chapman, 105 Me. 62, 72 A 750. (8) So also an antenuptial agreement, by which each party waives and releases all rights in the property of the other, being made by the woman with full knowledge of the nature, character, and value of the man's property, is effective to extinguish, not only her right of dower, widow's award, and thirds, but also her right of homestead, there being no minor children. Colbert v. Rings, 231 Ill. 404, 83 NE 274. (9) And an antenuptial contract made in good faith between parties, each of whom had real and personal property not disproportionate in value, providing that each thereby released and renounced all dower and other interest in the estate which the other party had or should thereafter acquire, with the intent that the property of each should descend to his or her lawful heirs, devested of all claims of dower or other interest that the other contracting party might have as husband or wife, widower, or widow, under the laws, was sufficient to bar the wife's statutory allowance, the rights of children not being involved. Rieger v. Schaible, 81 Nebr. 33, 115 NW 560, 17 LRANS 866 [reh den 81 Nebr. 58, 116 NW 953, 17 LRANS 866].

[c] Where agreement is violated.— Where an antenuptial agreement provides that the husband shall make a certain settlement on his widow by will, in lieu of dower or any set portion, and the terms of the will do not correspond with such agreement, his widow is entitled to the exempted property allowed by statute. Sheldon v. Bliss, 8 N. Y. 31.

[e] Repudiation of contract.—(1) An executory antenuptial contract releasing the widow's award may be repudiated by her, especially where the family consists in part of a child of the deceased husband. Zachman v. Zachmann, 201 Ill. 380, 66 NE 256, 94 AmSR 180. (2) "But when, without fraud or imposition, she deliberately accepts from her husband's legal representatives that which, by the terms of the contract, she was to receive in lieu of the award, the right to repudiate the contract at once ceases, and under such circumstances she is estopped from setting up a claim to the award itself,—and this is clearly right, upon the plainest principles of natural as well as legal justice." "It is true that in the case of Phelps v. Phelps, 72 Ill. 545, 22 AmR 149, the justice delivering the opinion indulged in observations on the subject of public policy, but the grounds of the decision were that a child was born of the marriage and was living with the widow at the time of filing the petition; that a widow's award is for the joint benefit of the widow and the minor children of the decedent; that, the specific allowance being as much for the benefit of the children as the widow, she has no power to deprive the children of such benefit by an antenuptial contract, and that to effect the purpose of the statute it is necessary that the widow shall share in the benefit of the award. If the wife had no power to release the widow's award because it was for the benefit of herself and the minor child, and the benefit of the provision of the statute could only be secured to the child by setting off the award to the mother as the natural guardian, the question of public policy was of no importance. If there was a want of power, the fact was conclusive in the case, and the attempted release would have been ineffective, no matter what public policy was. It is clear that the public concern that widows shall not become charges upon the public charitable institution of the State was not the ground of the decision, inasmuch as the court said that if there had been no child or children of the decedent residing with the widow after his death a very different question would have been presented, and that in such a case the award would have been for her sole use, and might be treated as a personal right which she could relinquish. It was distinctly held that the effect of the ante-nuptial contract was to bar her dower and prevent her taking any portion of the estate as heir under the statute, and, so far as considerations of public policy that widows shall not become public charges is concerned, the same rule would apply to dower and inheritance as to the award. The court afterward defined the exact scope of that decision in Weaver v. Weaver, 109 Ill. 225, where the court said: 'The only thing actually decided by the Phelps Case is that the award of a widow having a family consisting in part of a minor child of the deceased is not barred by an unexecuted ante-nuptial contract.' The court also said: 'The result of the decisions of this court, as we understand them, go to this extent, but no further. A widow having a family consisting in part of the decedent's children is entitled to the widow's award notwithstanding there is an outstanding ante-nuptial executory contract by which she has agreed to accept a certain sum of money or something else in lieu of it.'" [§ 813] 4. Testamentary Provisions and Election—a. In General. Testamentary provisions cannot, of themselves, interfere with the statutory right of the widow and children to support out of the estate,[69] and hence a will disposing of all of testator's estate and making no provision for the widow cannot affect her right to the statutory allowance;[70] but in such case she may claim her allowance or exemption without dissenting from the will.[71]

[§ 814] b. Election to Take under Will. While it has been held that if a widow elects to accept provision made for her in the decedent's will she cannot claim her statutory allowance in addition thereto,[72] the more general view is that the widow is entitled to her statutory allowance in addition to any provision made for her by the will,[73] even though such provision is in lieu of dower or similar rights,[74] unless such allowance would be inconsistent with the provisions of the will,[75] as where which recites the bequest in settlement of her interest, and which declares that she is satisfied with the provision in the will and agrees to accept the four hundred dollars in full satisfaction and agrees to take the same in monthly installments after his death, or in a lump sum at the option of the executors, is, so far as exemptions created by law are concerned, without consideration and is not binding on her, and she may demand her legal exemptions).

it appears that the testamentary provision was intended to be in lieu of the widow's statutory rights in her husband's estate.[76]

[§ 815] c. Dissent from Will. Where the widow elects not to take under the will, she is usually held entitled to her allowance,[77] nor is the allowance barred by electing to take a child's part in lands in lieu of dower.[78]

[§ 816] 5. Separate Estate or Homestead. Notwithstanding the widow may have a separate estate of her own, or may continue to occupy the homestead, she is usually granted the statutory allowance and exemption, especially if the income from such separate property is insufficient for a due maintenance.[79] But it has been held that a widow is not entitled to a homestead and a year's supply, where the aggregate of the two provisions exceeds the amount which may be set apart as a homestead and exemption under the law,[80] and that where a husband as the head of a family has a homestead set apart for himself and wife, and the widow after his death continues upon the property constituting the homestead for a great number of years, enjoying during that period the rents, issues, and profits of the homestead, she will not be allowed, after the expiration of such a time, to take a year's support out of the homestead property, but will be conclusively presumed to have made an election in favor of the enjoyment of the homestead as such, and against the right to have a year's support set apart to her.[81] Where an intestate left as his only estate property which was set aside as a homestead for himself and family, and his widow lived on the property for several months until her death, without making an application for a year's support, it was held that she had elected to take the homestead rather than the year's support, and her executor could not have the property set apart as a year's support to her estate.[82]

[§ 817] 6. Misconduct. Although some cases consider that misconduct is not sufficient to bar an allowance in the absence of an actual separation or divorce,[83] it is usually held that a widow's allowance may be denied for her misconduct, as in case of her adultery or a separation because of her own misconduct, while the marriage existed,[84] or

[§ 818] 7. Felonious Killing of Husband. It has been held that the fact that a wife has been convicted of feloniously killing her husband did not deprive her of the right to her statutory allowance out of his estate.[86]

[§ 819] 8. Separation. Under some statutes it has been held that the special allowance to a widow should be denied where she was not living in a family relation with her husband at the time of his death,[87] unless her separation was involuntary and through no fault of hers or was based upon reasons constituting a sufficient ground for divorce;[88] but under other statutes it has been considered that the right of the widow to an allowance is not defeated because of a mere separation between herself and her husband,[89] even though riage, of her right as widow. In re Drasdo, 36 Wash. 478, 78 P 1022.

"The act in question provides that the party guilty of killing another shall not take of the property by devise or descent. It has been often decided by this court that the statutory allowance to the widow of five hundred dollars does not pass to her, by reason of any law of descent, but is a preferred claim payable out of the personal estate of the deceased husband, if sufficient, and if insufficient then the balance shall be paid out of the real estate. . . . Therefore it must be conceded that the appellant's interest of five hundred dollars in her deceased husband's estate does not descend to her as his heir, and therefore the act of 1907 does not control. As there is no pretense that it was given her under the provisions of any will, therefore the provision that she shall not take by devise has no force in this case. The act in question is confined to 'devise' and 'descent' and could not be made to apply in this case, without reading something into the statute, which was not included therein by the legislature." Utah.—In re Beason, 49 Utah 24, 161 P 678.

[a] The burden of showing that the separation was not for sufficient cause is on the person claiming that the widow has forfeited her allowance. Linares v. Linares, 93 Tex. 84, 53 SW 579.

[c] Where desertion is justifiable. —An intestate left a widow to whom he was married in 1855, after having unlawfully cohabited with her for eight years. They lived together after marriage for about two years, when difficulties arising between them on account of his gross and confirmed habits of intoxication, which had existed throughout their cohabitation, they agreed that she should live apart from him for a year, and then return. Before she went away he withdrew his consent, but she insisted on leaving. At the end of the year she returned; but finding that he had a housekeeper, with whom she believed him to be living in adultery, there being no bed in the house but his own, she went away and never returned, and was not asked to do so, but continued living apart from him, rendering him no services, and supporting herself until his death, which took place some years afterward. She had no children by him, was in her seventieth year, and had no means of support. The probate court, upon the application of the widow, made her an allowance of three hundred and fifty dollars, and its decree was affirmed, on appeal by the administratrix, by a justice of the court. It was held, upon appeal to the full court, that the decree should be affirmed with costs. Slack v. Slack, 123 Mass. 443.

[d] Desertion by husband.—Where a husband leaves his wife in a foreign country with the understanding that she is to follow him when he shall have made a home for her in this country, and he subsequently settles in Pennsylvania, but does not inform her of his whereabouts, and afterward bigamously marries another woman and then dies, the first wife is entitled to the widow's exemption out of his estate if it appears that she was at all times ready to join her husband, and would have done so if she had not been kept in ignorance of his whereabouts. Grive's Est., 165 Pa. 126, 30 A 727 [dist Spier's App., 26 Pa. 233].

Reconciliation after separation. Where, after a contract for separation, the parties become reconciled and live together, the surviving wife, where the personalty directed by statute to be set aside to her is insufficient for her support, is entitled to an allowance for her maintenance pending administration.[91]

[§ 820] 9. Divorce. The widow's special allowance or exemption cannot be successfully claimed by a former wife of decedent who was divorced from him prior to his death,[92] and this has been held to be true even though the divorce was incomplete or invalid, where by virtue thereof she has long lived voluntarily apart from her husband.[93] A void divorce procured by the husband from a foreign tribunal does not deprive the widow of the statutory allowance,[94] but where a wife separated from her husband and remarried under the erroneous belief that she was divorced, and had children by such second marriage and never at any time had conjugal relations with decedent, she cannot be said to be a member of his family so as to entitle her to a widow's or family allowance.[95]

An interlocutory decree of divorce, requiring the husband to transfer to the wife certain property and allotting all other property of the community to the husband "free and clear of all claim of the wife," has been held not to defeat her statutory claim to a family allowance on his death.[96]

Support of child. Where an allowance for the support of a child has been granted in a decree of divorce, it is proper to deny an application by the mother, after the father's death, for an additional allowance for the support of the child under the statute relating to decedents' estates.[97]

[§ 821] 10. Relinquishment after Death of Decedent. While a widow's release of her allowance and exemptions after her husband's death does not necessarily conclude the rights of the children residing with her,[98] it will debar her,[99] especially when settlement of the estate has proceeded upon the faith of it,[1] unless she was imposed upon by others.[2] But she will not be barred unless the instrument executed by her clearly shows an intention to release these statutory rights,[3] and a consideration for the release is necessary.[4] Where the husband waives his right to have exempt property set apart to him from the estate of his deceased wife by refusing tender thereof from her executor, his executrix is barred from making a claim to have such property set apart.[5]

[§ 822] 11. Remarriage. While the remarriage of the widow does not divest her or minor children of allowances and exemptions already vested,[6] it ordinarily bars her from any subsequent claim upon the estate,[7] the order of allowance thereupon terminating without any further order of the court.[8] However, the widow's rights may continue notwithstanding her remarriage where this is in accordance with the legislative intent as shown by the statute.[9]

tling the estate[15] or unduly prejudice intervening rights.[16] So the widow's right may be lost if her application is not made until after the estate has been distributed,[17] the personalty used for the payment of debts,[18] or the property of the estate sold,[19] although there is no hard and fast rule of law that declares that a widow's claim of exemption is always too late if an order of sale has been already obtained.[20] Delay in taking out letters of administration has been held to be chargeable to the widow so as to preclude her setting up such delay as an excuse for her own delay in claiming her statutory allowance or exemptions,[21] but the weight of authority supports the contrary view.[22] The right of a child of deceased to have a probate homestead set aside to her out of the estate is forfeited by her failure to apply therefor during her minority.[23] Mere delay of a widow in demanding the accumulated allowance which has been regularly set apart for her does not forfeit her right to it.[24] Where a widow is barred by laches from administering on her husband's estate to procure the setting off of her award, her creditors cannot procure administration for this purpose in order that the award may be subjected to their claims.[25] A delay of a guardian cannot operate to give his own claim against the estate priority over the allowance to his ward.[26]

"Does the lapse of eight years without administration upon the estate of an intestate, bar the widow's right to claim a year's provision when administration is granted? If she files her petition 'at or before the first term when administration is granted,' she complies with the language of the act, and we can see no reason for a construction different from the plain import of the words. On the contrary, if the widow has supported herself and family during the first year of her destitution, it would appear reasonable that she should be reimbursed out of the estate of her husband. But it is suggested, that, as she had the right to administer in preference to others, and neglected to do so for that length of time, she thereby forfeited her right to a year's support. There may have been very good reasons for her failure to procure administration. She may have been prevented from so doing by circumstances beyond her control. Such a construction would operate very harshly upon old or infirm widows, or upon those who could not give the requisite bonds, and would defeat the humane purposes of the act, in the very cases which call loudest for its assistance. If the suggestion of delay has any weight, it applies to the next of kin and creditors with as much force as it does to the widow, for they could have claimed the right of administration promptly, when the widow failed to apply for and procure the same." "This provision becomes the absolute property of the widow on the death of the husband, though she should die without applying for it." Lamar v. Belcher, 154 Mo. A. 571, 572, 136 SW 748.

[a] Illustration.—Where an allowance was made to a widow by the court, and she was not paid all of it, but had expended for her support an amount equal to the sum allowed, some of which she had borrowed, the balance unpaid did not lapse by reason of her death after the end of the first year, but was payable to her administrator. In re Rice, 146 Iowa 48, 124 NW 792.

[b] Right of selection surviving to representative.—On the death of a widow before the property allowed to her by statute has been set apart by order of the probate court, or before she has selected the same, the property and right to selection survives to her personal representative. [c] The right of a surviving husband to select personal property may be exercised by his administrator. In re Walberg, 130 Minn. 462, 153 NW 876.

[d] Exercise or nonexercise of right.—The decree of a judge of probate allowing to a widow personal estate, to a certain amount, as necessaries, if not appealed from, establishes conclusively her right to select such items from the inventory as she may prefer, to that amount, and to demand the same from the executor, and such right, if exercised by her in her lifetime, survives to her legal representatives, but if not so exercised it does not survive. is made and the property separated from the rest of the estate,[32] although under some statutes a selection or setting apart is not necessary where the value of decedent's property does not exceed a given amount.[33] Whether with or without an order of court, and whether before or during administration, the fact of such selection should be established as the statute may have provided.[34] The selection may be made at the appraised value of property[35] notwithstanding a rise in value after appraisal;[36] but the widow has not a right of selection at her own valuation where others are willing to give more for the property.[37] Selections from both realty and personalty may be made at the same time.[38] The right to select continues as long as the statute designates, and the representative cannot defeat such selection by prematurely or improperly using the assets for other purposes of administration;[39] but it has been held that the widow is restricted to the designation made.[40] The guardian of one minor child may select as next friend of another minor child.[41] The filing of a petition by a widow and minor children for the setting apart of one thousand dollars out of the proceeds of a life insurance policy payable to the estate constitutes a sufficient selection of such property;[42] and where the statute allows the widow to occupy lands up to a certain amount, a sufficient selection is indicated by occupying and using the land or by claiming the annual crops when interfered with by others.[43]

[§ 826] 2. By Executors, Administrators, Commissioners, or Appraisers—a. In General. Under some statutes the property must be set apart by decedent's personal representatives,[44] by commissioners appointed for that purpose,[45] or by appraisers,[46] upon the widow's seasonable and proper demand,[47] or, under some statutes, without any demand.[48]

[§ 827] b. Liability of Representative for Refusing to Act or Abusing Power. If the personal representative wrongfully refuses to act or abuses his power in the premises he may be controlled by the court and made to rectify,[49] or he may be held liable in an action by the widow for the recovery of the allowance or exemption,[50] or for its conversion,[51] or in an action for damages.[52] Interest may be allowed from the date of the representative's refusal to pay the allowance,[53] but not, it has been held, until after an election to take the allowance in cash.[54]

[§ 828] c. Credit for Allowance in Accounts. An order of court is not always necessary to enable the executor or administrator to make reasonable and proper payments to the widow for a family allowance;[55] and if he actually appropriates assets for allowance to the widow, or proceeds fairly with her permission to appropriate, he is entitled to credit accordingly.[56]

Insolvency of estate. A payment by the administrator to the widow for family support when the estate was solvent, and there was no reason to think that it would be insolvent, should be allowed, although when the account is settled, the estate is insolvent.[57]

[§ 829] 3. Appraisement—a. Necessity. An actual appraisement of the estate is usually a prerequisite to a proper setting apart of the widow's allowance,[58] unless she elects to claim her exemption in money or out of evidences of debts,[59] or the estate has previously been appraised,[60] or unless the statute dispenses therewith.[61] It has been considered that an appraisement is necessary only where the widow elects to take personal estate,[62] and hence where she claims her exemption out of the proceeds of realty an appraisement is not necessary;[63] but where she elects to retain cash from the personalty and the inventory shows that decedent left no cash, an appraisement of realty is necessary to entitle the widow to her allowance from the proceeds of realty.[64] It has been held that if a widow, who is neither executrix nor administratrix, and has not been guilty of laches, makes a demand for an appraisement of the real estate, before an order of sale for the payment of debts is asked for, she may claim her exemption out of the fund arising from the sale, although no appraisement has been made.[65]

[§ 830] b. Demand. It has been held that a seasonable demand of appraisement by the widow is required where such appraisement is an essential preliminary to her allowance,[66] but there is also authority for the view that the executor or administrator instead of the widow may demand an appraisement.[67]

[§ 831] c. Appraisers. The appraisers should usually be disinterested persons, and the same who appraise the general estate of decedent.[68] Two appraisers are sufficient under some statutes.[69]

[§ 832] d. Oath of Appraisers. The oath of the appraisers should be in substantial conformity to the statutory requirements.[70]

[§ 833] e. Time for Appraisement. An appraisement will be ordered on the widow's application at any time while the estate remains unsettled.[71] An appraisement made before the solvency of the estate is determined is valid.[72]

[§ 834] f. Necessity for Compliance with Statutory Requirements. The appraisement must be made in the manner provided by statute.[73]

[§ 835] g. Notice of Proceedings. It has been held that no notice is required of proceedings to

[a] One who claims to be entitled

set apart the exemptions of the widow and children by appraisers;[74] but it has also been held that if a new appraisement is ordered, notice of proceedings therein should be given to the executor or administrator.[75]

[§ 836] h. Powers and Duties of Appraisers. It has been held that a statute requiring appraisers to set apart property is mandatory[76] and leaves them no discretion except as to the nature of the property,[77] and where the appraisers have omitted to set aside property of the value specified, the decree on the judicial accounting of the executor should award that relief to the surviving husband.[78] Whether appraisers are to set apart specifically or merely to certify value and report to the court, they should perform their duty diligently,[79] and they cannot set apart more than the specified value or amount.[80] The items should be appraised separately,[81] but things which belong to the widow absolutely need not be appraised.[82] It has been held that appraisers appointed on the application of the widow cannot appraise if she dies meanwhile.[83] The value of a decedent's land in relation to his widow's exemption should be computed on so much of the land as decedent owned, and not on the entire tract, where decedent was not the sole owner.[84] Where, in a proceeding to have a widow's three hundred dollar exemption charged upon her husband's lands, the widow also elected to take real estate to the value of five thousand dollars, the appraisers had no authority to determine the value of the husband's lands out of which the widow elected to take her exemption, where they determined such land to be worth more than three hundred dollars and that it could not be divided without prejudice.[85]

[§ 837] i. Certificates as to Feasibility of Division. A certificate in writing that the division returned can be made without injury to the whole property is sometimes required.[86]

[§ 838] j. Report or Return—(1) In General. The appraisers should make and file a true return within the time limited by statute,[87] and their report must describe the land set aside with certainty.[88] But where a report of appraisers to set apart a year's support shows that they appraised the entire estate and designated the whole of it as a year's allowance to the widow, failure minutely to describe the realty in the report does not render the proceedings void.[89] An appraisement may be invalid for uncertainty[90] or for setting down the value of the property too high or too low;[91] but it is not invalidated by mere inaccuracy in describing the property,[92] and it has been held that the fact that a return set apart as a year's support an excessive amount, in view of the condition of the estate as to solvency, does not authorize the jury to treat the return as void, in a collateral attack thereon seven years after it was admitted to record.[93] The appraisers' return is taken to be prima facie correct[94] and is accepted as showing the true value of the property, unless fraud be made to ap-to land by virtue of a year's support alleged to have been set apart to him and others out of the land by appraisers must show that there has been a full compliance with all the requirements of the law in regard to the setting apart of the year's support. Horn v. Truett, 114 Ga. 995, 41 SE 498.

McSwain v. Ricketson, 129 Ga. 176, 58 SE 655. (2) A description of land in the report of commissioners who set apart a year's support as "20 acres of land valued at $250," is too indefinite to be enforced, where it does not appear that entire estate of decedent was intended to be set aside. Hutchinson v. Woodward, 145 Ga. 325, 89 SE 208.

[b] Necessity for extraneous evidence.—The return of appraisers appointed to set apart a year's support to a widow and minor child is not necessarily void for uncertainty in the description of the land because extraneous evidence is necessary to apply the description to the subject matter. The allottment was sufficiently definite, so that the record thereof was properly admitted in an action by the widow for a conversion of the property allotted. Parker v. Brown, 136 N. pear.[95] Where the return described the property set aside as a certain number of acres of land, "more or less, including homestead," it was held that the words "more or less" indicated that no precise number of acres was intended, but that the statement of the quantity was given as descriptive of the land assigned.[96] A report purporting merely to allow the property to the widow does not exclude the children.[97] Where the return of property set apart as a year's support to a widow and four minor children has been approved and entered of record, it is not void because it omits the names of the minor children.[98] The return cannot be altered after it has been filed.[99]

[§ 839] (2) Objections and Hearing Thereon. Persons interested may file objections to the report,[1] and a hearing on such objections should be had,[2] the court being sometimes permitted to substitute its own judgment for that of the appraisers concerning the award.[3]

[§ 840] (3) Collateral Attack. A return setting apart as a year's support an excessive amount cannot be treated as void in a collateral attack thereon seven years after it was admitted to record.[4]

[§ 841] (4) Record. Where commissioners are appointed to set apart and assign to a widow and her minor children a year's support, their return is not effective as a judgment until recorded, although no objections are filed.[5] Mere delay in recording the return does not divest interests thereunder.[6]

[§ 842] k. Confirmation. The probate court has usually the power to confirm or disallow the report of appraisers,[7] and the judge's confirmation, when made is conclusive as a judgment in rem, binds all others in interest unless attacked on the special grounds available for such judgments, and fixes at once the widow's award as her exclusive property.[8] The confirmation is, however, only conclusive as to the matters to which it relates.[9] Where the property selected is destroyed before the appraisement is approved and no interests of creditors are involved, the court may decline to approve the appraisement;[10] and although the jurisdiction of the probate court to award exempt property to a widow extends no farther than to confirm the report of commissioners setting apart the property and to declare that result, an additional provision in a decree that the title is vested in the widow in fee is mere surplusage and does not affect its validity.[11] Where objections to the return have been sustained so as to have the effect of amending the return, the return and the judgment may be recorded and will be effective to set apart as support the property or money included in the report as corrected by the judgment.[12] A judgment lien against land appraised to the widow is not sufficient to prevent confirmation when the title vested in her is made subject to the lien.[13] It has been considered that a formal judgment is necessary only where the appraisers set apart a sum of money,[14] and a record confirming a commissioner's report setting aside a year's support out of testator's land has the effect and force of a judgment.[15]

[§ 843] l. Effect of Setting Apart. Where there were two sets of children living at the time the year's support was set apart and the return did not specify what portion of the land should be set apart to the children of the deceased wife, but instead set apart a year's support generally, it was held that whatever might be the rights of the children of the surviving wife, the children of the deceased wife could claim no benefit under the year's support proceedings.[16] Where, on the widow's petition for a year's support, part of a lot was set apart for her and decedent's minor children, and on her subsequent petition for herself and the chil-

[b] Time for objections.—Where an application has been made by a widow for a year's support from the estate of her deceased husband, and after notice has been given to the legal representatives appraisers have been appointed and have made a return, and a citation has been published, objections may be made at or before the next term of the court of ordinary, and if not made until such term, they should be made before final action on the publication, and objections made after the final application are too late. Foster v. Turnbull, 125 Ga. 654, 55 SE 925 (no objections having been filed to a widow's allowance and the ordinary, at first term of court, having ordered that the return of the appraisers shall be recorded after regular application, notice, citation, and publication, it is not an abuse of discretion to refuse to open a judgment at a late date during the term and allow objections to be then filed).

[c] Amendment.—The court's intimation of an intention to sustain a motion to dismiss the caveat to the report made on a widow's application for a year's support does not deprive the caveators of their right to amend. Ray v. Ray, 142 Ga. 290, 82 SE 892.

[§ 844] m. Setting Aside Appraisement or Allotment. The award may be set aside by the probate court, even after the term at which it was approved, where the applicant acts with reasonable promptness.[18] A claim that the property was valued too low will not suffice to set aside the appraisement, except on very clear testimony,[19] but an appraisement will be set aside where many articles were clearly undervalued and some were appraised without being seen.[20] The probate court cannot set aside the allotment to the widow on its own motion.[21] Laches may bar the widow's right to have a decree of confirmation opened and the appraisement set aside, even as to a single item.[22]

[§ 845] n. Review. Some statutes permit an appeal from the probate court,[23] either in all cases or where the allowance of the appraisers has been increased or diminished;[24] and it has been considered that an appeal from the final order of the probate court opens all questions.[25] But it has been held that on appeal there is no power to modify the report of the appraisers.[26] Where, on trial of the objections to an allowance to a widow, the ordinary overrules the objections and approves a report of the appraisers and enters a judgment setting apart the property as a year's support, an appeal to the superior court by the creditors suspends the judgment, and the widow acquires no vested right to the property until affirmance by the superior court.[27] The objector is held to be entitled to open and close upon appeal from the appraisers' return where both parties introduce evidence.[28] A caveat to the appraisers' report cannot be amended on appeal so as to bring in issue an objection not made in the lower court,[29] but a merely formal amendment may be permitted.[30] Where the appeal results in a reduction of the award, costs of the proceedings are properly allowed against the applicant.[31]

[§ 846] o. Marshaling Assets and Interpleader. Where, after appeal by a creditor from an order of the ordinary overruling his objections to an allowance to a widow, the administrator of the deceased husband files a petition to marshal the assets, and alleges that the creditor claims to own a portion of the land set apart as a year's support, and that other creditors claim other portions thereof, and prays that they and the widow interplead, a decree in favor of the creditors, and holding that the title to the property set apart was in the creditors at the time of the husband's death, binds not only the administrator, but the heirs of the deceased and his widow, although the administrator of the widow, who had died pending the litigation, was dismissed from the bill before the decree.[32]

[§ 847] L. Allowance by Court—1. In General. Usually the property set off to the widow should regularly pass through the probate court with other administration of the estate;[33] and it is within the discretion of such court to apportion a reasonable allowance for the maintenance of decedent's family pending administration,[34] either upon its own motion [35] or upon the application of a proper person.[36] The court has also power to grant such orders or entertain such proceedings as may be necessary to enforce a setting apart of the allowance or exemption.[37]

[§ 848] 2. Form of Proceedings. An allowance of a year's support to the widow can only be made in a proceeding for the administration of the estate, and not in a suit to quiet title to lands standing in decedent's name, to which the widow claims title.[38]

[§ 849] 3. Time for Application or Allowance. The widow's petition for an allowance may be filed within a reasonable time after decedent's death,[39] or after the filing of an inventory and appraisement,[40] and under various statutes such application may be at the term of the court at which letters of administration are taken out,[41] or at which final settlement is made.[42] It has been held that an allowance for the support of the family may be made by the probate court before the return of the inventory and appraisal,[43] or before exempt property and homstead have been set apart for the use of the family;[44] but statutes sometimes limit the power of the court to make allowances to the widow so that it can be exercised only in settling the accounts of the executor or administrator.[45]

[§ 850] 4. Counterclaim. Where a widower claims personal property of his wife, the administrator may set up as a counterclaim claimant's unauthorized use of property, other than that which passed to claimant absolutely, before the administrator came into possession.[46]

[§ 851] 5. Jurisdiction. In the matter of making the widow's allowance, a probate court has only such jurisdiction and authority as is given to it by statute.[47] The court should not, in this connection, determine matters which lie outside its own statutory jurisdiction and pertain to the ordinary courts of justice[48] or matters of which jurisdiction has previously been obtained by another court.[49] The court of probate has, however, jurisdiction to determine which of two claimants is entitled to a widow's award,[50] and where a separation agreement between husband and wife making complete disposition of their property rights has been fully executed, and the wife is nevertheless claiming a widow's allowance, the probate court has equitable jurisdiction to pass upon the validity and effect of such agreement.[51] A circuit court cannot make any allowance for the support of the widow where the probate court, having original and exclusive jurisdiction in the matter, was not appealed to.[52]

[§ 852] 6. Parties. A petition for an allowance on behalf of the widow may be made by the personal representative,[53] by the widow her-

Such construction would involve hardships which it is the reasonable purpose of the statutes, construed as a whole, to prevent. The direct converse has, moreover, been the generally accepted construction and practice. That contemporaneous exposition should be given great weight. State v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 95 Minn. 43, 103 NW 731. self,[54] or by a committee in lunacy if she is insane,[55] or on behalf of minors by a guardian[56] or next friend.[57] Where the widow acts for her minor children as well as for herself, such children are plaintiffs, and the judgment is in their behalf.[58] All persons interested should be made parties, such as the administrator[59] and children, whether minor[60] or adult.[61]

[§ 853] 7. Notice.[62] While notice of the widow's petition and proceedings thereunder should usually be given to the executor or administrator,[63] unless he otherwise has notice[64] or has waived formal notice by his voluntary appearance,[65] it has been considered in a number of cases that notice to the personal representative or the heirs is not essential to the jurisdiction of the court;[66] and an allowance will not be disturbed for want of notice.[67] Notice to general creditors is not ordinarily required,[68] although it has been held necessary where the whole estate is set apart.[69] The widow and children cannot complain that notice of the proceedings was not given to others.[70]

[§ 854] 8. Application or Petition. Under some statutes a written application is necessary,[71] but under others the application need not be in writing.[72] Even where a written petition is required its allegations need not be precise, but informalities and omissions are treated with leniency,[73] although, where a homestead has been set apart to the widow and children, it has been held proper to refuse to make a family allowance out of the estate where the petition therefor failed to state that the homestead was insufficient for the support of the family.[74] A complaint by a widow against the administrator to recover her statutory allowance, which alleges that she has demanded the amount of the administrator, and although "said administrator had, as such, sufficient funds with which to comply with said demand, or a part thereof," he refused to pay, sufficiently alleges the existence of funds with which to pay the allowance,[75] and it is not necessary that a copy of the will be attached to the complaint, although the will devises to her such part of her husband's estate "as she may be entitled to under the statutes in force at the time of his death, and nothing more," her action being under the statute, and not on the will.[76] A petition "in the nature of a bill in equity for a new trial," by minor children of an insolvent decedent, asking that a judgment of foreclosure in which they were not made parties be set aside, and also asking the court to fix and pay out of certain property their allowance, is sufficient as to the prayer for allowance, although they are not entitled to have the judgment set aside.[77] Where a widow whose husband had died testate petitioned for an allowance from his estate for a year's support for herself and minor children, the petition alleging that the husband died intestate, that there was a certain sum in the hands of the executors, and stating what sum was necessary for support of herself and children, a charge that the petition was fraudulent was not supported, although the widow had means of her own when the petition was made.[78] It has been held that while it would be the better practice to file separate petitions for the widow's personal property exemption and for her statutory allotment out of the realty, relief may be granted under a petition praying for both.[79] Where the statute does not require a widow's application for the setting apart of exempt property of her deceased husband's estate to be verified, such application may be amended by inserting the name of a minor child, who was entitled to participate in the allowance.[80]

[§ 855] 9. Objections and Exceptions. Any person concerned in the administration of the estate may interpose a caveat to an application for a year's support.[81] Objections and exceptions to the allowance should be clear and specific, as well as seasonably made,[82] but persons interested in an intestate's estate are not estopped to object to an allowance to the widow for a period after the expiration of a reasonable time for the settlement of the estate, because they could have compelled her, as administratrix, to have promptly settled and distributed the estate, but failed to do so.[83] Where the ordinary has duly complied with the statutory requirements as to issuing citation and publishing notice with regard to an application for a year's support, it is too late, after the adjournment of the term of his court to which the citation is returnable, to file objections to the granting of such application.[84]

[§ 856] 10. Evidence. It is incumbent upon the petitioner to show all facts necessary to establish the right to an allowance,[85] as that she was decedent's lawful wife at the time of his death,[86] that the allowance is necessary,[87] or that the children have no other resources.[88] But the burden is upon the one asserting it to show the fact of divorce[89] or the nonresidence of decedent,[90] and it has also been held incumbent on one who claims that a wife has forfeited her right to allowance by reason of her separation from decedent to show that there was no sufficient cause to justify such separation.[91] The widow is presumed to be a proper person to receive the family allowance and to have the custody of the children.[92] The presumption being that decedent's wife was a member of his family,[93] proof that applicant is the widow imposes on one opposing the application the burden of showing that she was not a member of decedent's family at the time of his death.[94] Evidence of the financial condition of the estate is admissible,[95] and where the guardian of decedent's child applies for a separate allowance for his ward, the widow, to whom a family allowance has been made, should be allowed to testify that she is willing and able properly to support the child.[96] A contract between a widow and other devisees disposing of the estate otherwise than as directed by the will which, by decree, has been determined to be a valid contract, is admissible on the hearing of the widow's application for an allowance.[97] On an application by a widow for an allowance pending administration and the probate of the will, evidence, opposing the application, that she wrongfully appropriated money of her husband to her own use during his lifetime is wholly irrelevant.[98] Since a family allowance for minor children must be paid to their guardian or for necessaries, and not paid to the guardian ad litem, the poverty of the mother having custody of the children is immaterial except as a circumstance justifying an increase of the allowance.[99] A judgment of the circuit court approving an estimate of appraisers on a widow's award was not without evidence to support it merely because the estimate of the appraisers was not offered in evidence, the report not being evidence, but merely the basis of the proceeding.[1] Where the widow, in her petition for an allowance, alleges that there was no issue of the marriage, and the administrator, in his petition for letters, alleges that decedent died without issue, the fact may be considered established, and no evidence thereof is necessary.[2]

[§ 857] 11. Trial or Hearing. The hearing of an application for an allowance involves the discretionary powers of the court,[3] in the determination or enforcing of which it may exercise summary and to what was required to support herself and children did not amount to a statement that she had no resources of her own).

plenary powers,[4] as by allowing an amendment of the petition,[5] by granting a stay of proceedings,[6] or by trying issues out of regular order.[7] But the court can determine only such questions as are raised by the pleadings,[8] and its discretion does not extend to refusing the allowance, where the conditions contemplated by the statute providing therefor exist.[9] Where a jury trial is had, the functions of the jury are confined to a consideration of the facts of the case under instructions declaring the law.[10]

[§ 858] 12. New Trial. A new trial is not authorized where, on a widow's petition, written objections were filed and after a hearing the allowance was granted.[11] A motion for a new trial is not a proper procedure after the court in probate proceedings sets apart a homestead to the widow, with certain property as exempt from execution, and awards her a family allowance, it being the duty of the court ex parte and without petition to make such orders.[12]

[§ 859] 13. Judgment or Order[13]—a. In General. The granting of the widow's allowance or exemption should be made by a proper judgment or order,[14] which should recite notice to the personal representative,[15] sufficiently describe the property set aside,[16] and afford relief by an appropriation of assets in the hands of the executor or administrator, rather than by a judgment against him personally.[17] A judgment in the alternative is improper,[18] but mere informalities or immaterial omissions in the judgment do not usually affect its validity.[19] The presumptions are in favor of the judgment or order,[20] and it need not contain a finding that the allowance is necessary,[21] that property exempt from execution and already set apart is insufficient,[22] or that the value of exempt property set apart is not in excess of the statutory limit.[23] A judgment setting apart a year's support is not void because the return of the appraisers was not filed within the time specified by the order appointing them,[24] and as against creditors whose debts are not secured by the loan deed, a judgment of a year's support, assigning the widow and minor children of a decedent a specifically described tract of land, subject to a loan deed for a stated amount, is not void on the ground that the title to the land was not in decedent.[25]

[§ 860] b. Nunc Pro Tunc Order. An order nunc pro tunc may be made covering the same items included in the original order upon objection thereto and due notice given of a subsequent hearing.[26]

[§ 861] c. ance before the return of the inventory of the estate by the executors ceases to be operative upon such return,[30] even though it contains the words "until further order" of the court.[31] An order fixing a widow's allowance is conclusive of her right thereto when not appealed from.[32] Where a court sitting in probate removed the independent executrix and appointed her administratrix, a subsequent allowance to testator's widow and children was res judicata in a contest over the classification of claims.[33]

[§ 862] d. Enforcement. An independent intervention cannot be filed by a minor son for the purpose of securing the payment of a judgment for a year's support, unless the widow has failed or neglected to intervene or is in collusion with other creditors.[34]

[§ 863] e. Setting Aside.[35] It has been held that a county court may, for fraud or mistake, vacate at a subsequent term an order approving the award for the widow's allowance,[36] and that an administrator who pays out money on allowance orders before distribution is charged with knowledge of the power of the court over such orders and makes the payment at his own risk.[37] It is also held that a widow who appeals from an order of the county court vacating an order approving her allowance, and subsequently appears to ask a new allowance, waives any objections to the jurisdiction of the court over her person on the motion to vacate the order.[38] Where a widow, in violation of an agreement with her stepchildren, procured the ordinary to set apart whole of the estate for a year's support, it was held that a court of equity, on timely application, would set aside the judgment for fraud, the stepchildren having had no actual knowledge of the proceeding before final judgment, the estate having been undervalued, and the judgment being grossly excessive.[39]

[§ 864] f. Collateral Attack. An order for a family allowance is not subject to collateral attack.[40]

[§ 865] 14. Review. Appeals generally in probate proceedings have been treated elsewhere.[41] An appeal usually lies from the judgment or decree of the probate court making or refusing an allowance to the widow,[42] although it has been held otherwise where the issue was as to the amount of the allowance and the kind of property of which it should consist,[43] or where the order was merely interlocutory.[44] An appeal may be taken by any party aggrieved by the decree below,[45] such as the personal representative,[46] a creditor,[47] or a distributee.[48] Where an order making an allowance to a widow refers to a previous order of a similar character, but makes different provisions from those of such previous order, the previous order is no longer in force, so that an appeal from the modifying order brings up the whole question for review.[49] An objection not raised in the probate court cannot be considered on appeal.[50] On an appeal by a beneficiary under a will from a decree granting an allowance to the testator's widow for her necessities following decedent's death, that view of the evidence most favorable to the widow should be adopted,[51] and where the showing made to the county court is sufficient to justify an award made to the widow for her allowance out of an insolvent estate, it will not be reversed.[52] The discretion of the probate judge will not be disturbed on appeal unless he has abused it,[53] has been guilty of manifest error,[54] or has exceeded his jurisdiction.[55] Neither will findings, in support of which there is evidence, be reviewed.[56] Under some statutes the appellate court tries the case de novo and is not confined to a review of the order appealed from on the return of the probate court.[57] A widow who has appealed from a judgment against her on her petition for an allowance is entitled to dismiss where she is not prepared for trial;[58] and where a widow who is also administratrix has appealed from an order denying her motion to set apart to her as widow the whole of the estate, but has filed no undertaking on appeal, the appeal must be dismissed.[59] A judgment of the circuit court on appeal from the estimate of appraisers on the widow's award has been held not improper, because it affirmed and approved the order of the probate court, as if it were a court of review, where such part of the judgment was merely preliminary and was followed by a judgment containing all the formal requisites.[60] A judgment denying to a widow a family allowance as prayed for by her in an amended petition therefor, rendered on appeal by certain creditors of decedent from a judgment awarding an allowance, precludes the widow from further proceeding under the original petition, and inures to the benefit of all creditors of decedent, and a creditor appealing generally from the judgment and order granting an allowance is entitled to a reversal, although he stood on his demurrer to the original petition which was overruled, and took no further part in the proceedings, during which the petition was amended so as to withstand the demurrer, by alleging other distinct grounds for its relief.[61]

[§ 866] 15. Costs. Costs are usually in the discretion of the court,[62] which may allow costs to a widow who has prevailed in two successive appeals from a decree granting her an allowance,[63] allow costs out of the estate where the widow has died after the filing of a petition for an allowance,[64] or refuse to allow either party the costs of an appeal.[65] Where appraisers set apart to a husband as exempt certain articles specified in the statute, and also set apart a sum of money in lieu of other articles mentioned in the statute, an allowance of costs to the husband could not be sustained where the decree was reversed so far as it directed the executor to pay the money set apart by the appraisers.[66] Where the decree makes the allowance a charge on real estate, such costs as were incident to, or occasioned by, such charge and proceedings to enforce it, including costs of an appeal from the decree, may be collected.[67] Where an appeal from an allowance of the widow's exemption was dismissed, it was held that the costs to which the widow was entitled did not include the cost of the petition and advertising the widow's claim,[68] or the cost of printing the record on the appeal.[69] A decree may be amended so as to include costs.[70]

[§ 867] M. Effect of Allowance—1. In General. Property of a decedent, which is directed by statute to be set apart to a widow, vests in her at once by operation of law on the death of her husband.[71] The setting apart of property to her by way of such allowance vests in her or in her and her children a complete title under most statutes[72] and payment or delivery of the allowance or exemption should be made directly to the widow to be held in trust for the maintenance of herself and minor children.[73] Where an order for a family allowance has been made and remains in force, the executor or administrator is bound to pay it,[74] unless, of course, he has not funds or property out of the estate out of which it can be paid.[75] Where a year's support is set apart out of homestead property, the homestead becomes extinguished.[76] Where part of decedent's property is set aside as a year's support of his widow and their minor child, and separate property is set aside for the support of decedent's minor child by a former marriage, the estates in the property so set aside are separate.[77]

[§ 868] 2. Right of Disposal. The widow has sometimes the right to mortgage or dispose of the property and appropriate the proceeds for the support of herself and children in any manner[78] that does not deprive the minor children of the benefit thereof;[79] and the widow is sometimes relieved, by statute, from accountability to the children for the disposition of the family allowance.[80] It has also been held that, where lands are set apart as a year's support to a widow and her child, if the child becomes of age and removes from the land, the widow may sell the same for her own support,[81] notwithstanding the fact that she has married again,[82] and that if the children are of age, but have left the land for the widow's support, a sale and conveyance by the widow divests the title of the children as heirs of the decedent and their claims upon the land as beneficiaries under the allowance.[83] But under other statutes the right of the widow to dispose of the property is denied.[84]

[§ 869] 3. Lien. An allowance awarded to a widow out of her husband's estate but for which no property has been assigned constitutes a lien to be enforced like other liens,[85] and does not cease to be a lien because the widow, who is also administratrix, has received more than the amount of the award from the rent of the homestead, and in settling up a claim for causing decedent's death.[86]

[§ 870] N. Increase or Further Allowance. Allowance for a limited period is permitted under some statutes with a further discretionary allowance during the progress of administration upon the petition of the widow, or children, if she is dead, if the estate is solvent, and the former allowance insufficient.[87] So also a further allowance may sometimes be made where new assets have come to the estate.[88] Such increase or further allowance should be granted in accordance with a just discretion and with due regard to the rights of others who may be interested in the estate;[89] but it has been held to be no ground for denying such further allowance that the widow has abundant means of her own,[90] or that she and the children left the state on the death of decedent and continued to reside elsewhere.[91] After the probate court has overruled an application for a further allowance, unless its action is vacated by appeal or other proceeding, it cannot review and increase the allowance.[92]

Services rendered to the estate by the widow. It has been held that a widow who has drawn her support from the estate of her husband during the year following his death, although it was not formally set apart, and although she rendered valuable services to the estate throughout the same period, is entitled to no further allowance by way of a year's support, but if she would obtain compensation for her services, she must look to his representatives.[93]

Additional allowance to children. It has been held that a judge of probate, after making an allowance to a widow, out of her husband's estate, for herself and the minor children of a previous wife, cannot afterward decree an additional allowance to such children for the reason that the widow abandoned them without their receiving the benefit of any of the funds in her hands;[94] and a fortiori it is improper to make an additional allowance for a child where a substantial family allowance has already been made to the widow and it does not appear that she is not applying the same to the benefit of the child.[95] But in another case where judgment was rendered on an agreed statement of facts, setting aside a second year's support for minors, and objections were made on the ground that one year's support had already been set aside to the minor children and widow, and that during the life of the widow she had been assigned out of the estate a dower, on which she and the minor children lived during the year for which

[a] Where the debts exceeded the whole estate, which was about six thousand four hundred dollars, and the widow's dower was worth six hundred and forty dollars, and the court had allowed her six hundred dollars, a further allowance was not reasonable. Cummings v. Allen, 34 N. H. 194.

[b] When the personal estate is exhausted.—After the widow has received the amount of the first allowance, and all the personal estate has been exhausted in the payment of debts and charges of administration, although within one year from the appointment of the administrator, no further allowance can be made to the widow, and no appeal can be taken by her, or allowed on her petition, from the decree making the first allowance. Hale v. Hale, 1 Gray (Mass.) 518.

[c] When denial proper.—Where a year's support, on application of the widow, has been set apart to her from the estate of her deceased husband by proceedings in the court of ordinary, to which no exceptions were filed, and from which no appeal was taken, her petition to the ordinary to vacate such judgment with the view of having set aside to her the entire estate, which she alleges is worth less than five hundred dollars, is demurrable, when the only ground for the relief sought is a mistake of the appraisers, made before the application for a year's support was filed, by including in their inventory property which did not belong to the estate, and which, if eliminated from their return, would have reduced their estimate of the value of the estate to less than five hundred dollars. Especially is this true when it does not appear from the petition that the facts therein stated were not known to the petitioner, and could not have been ascertained by the exercise of ordinary diligence, before the final judgment sought to be set aside was rendered. Birt v. Brown, 106 Ga. 23, 31 SE 755.

an application for support was made, but it did not appear that a continuance of the administration for a longer time than one year was attributable to the minors, it was held that their right to support was personal to them, and existed as a matter of law, and the enjoyment of the gratuity afforded by their mother of living with her was no reason for depriving them of the same.[96]

[§ 871] O. Decrease or Revocation of Allowance. Upon an application within a reasonable time an order of the court may be made modifying or revoking a former order of allowance,[97] but such an order cannot be made retroactive in its effect or require the widow to account for any portion of what she may already have received or expended.[98] It has been held that no appeal lies from an order discontinuing an allowance to a widow.[99] Where, upon showing a change in the condition of the estate or the circumstances of the widow, a reasonable reduction or stoppage appears justified, all further property will fall into the general personal estate as assets.[1] An executor or administrator is charged with knowledge of the power of the court to modify or set aside orders for allowances and pays out money without or on such orders at his own risk.[2] An order discontinuing a family allowance will be presumed, on collateral attack, to have been made on proper notice.[3]

[§ 872] P. Rights of Creditors[4]—1. In General. An allowance by order of the court for the widow and children is not subject to the demands of decedent's creditors, either in the widow's own hands[5] or in the hands of her assignee.[6] But a creditor may have the judgment or order making the allowance vacated for good cause shown, as for fraud or mistake.[7] Where a family allowance was granted from the proceeds of an estate before the return of the inventory, and the executors continued to make payments under such order after the return of the inventory, and the court impliedly recognized its continuance by subsequently modifying it and thereafter granting ex parte orders authorizing the custodian of the funds of the estate to pay certain sums on account thereof, under the mistaken belief, which was shared by creditors of the estate, that it did not become ineffective on the return of such inventory, these facts did not prevent the creditors from contesting such payments on an application for the allowance of the accounts of the administratrix.[8] Where the widow selects

[e] Change of conditions.—Upon its being shown that the condition of the estate or of the family had changed since an order was made allowing the widow a certain sum, at certain intervals, for her support pending the settlement of the estate, the county judge might make an order diminishing such allowance for the future, at his discretion. [h] Delay precluding relief.—(1) Where one of the executors of a will learned of an order granting testator's widow an allowance for a year's support, a few days after the order was entered, an application by him, made two years later, to set aside the order, cannot be maintained, because of his delay, even though the widow was guilty of fraud in making the application. Busby v. Busby, 120 Iowa 536, 95 NW 191. (2) Where the county court approved an allowance to the widow, and the residuary legatee, having been brought into court for probate of the will, did not file a petition for reduction of the allowance until fifteen months after the award was made, the petition was properly dismissed for failure to ask the aid of the court within a reasonable time. and claims or disposes of property to which she is not entitled as against the decedent's creditors, their rights will be judicially protected,[9] and if a judgment setting aside a year's support to the widow is void as far as the real estate is concerned because it is insufficiently described, the judgment creditors of the estate do not need the aid of a court of equity to have such property sold to pay the debts.[10]

Creditors of widow. Property set apart for a year's support of the widow and her minor children jointly is not subject to payment of a judgment for a debt contracted by the widow individually, in consideration of which minors had no interest.[11]

[§ 873] 2. Limitations and Laches. Creditors will be denied relief, even where the allowances are extravagant or otherwise improper, where they are guilty of laches in applying for such relief,[12] as where they fail to object thereto until after final settlement of the executor's accounts including such payments,[13] or where they do not appeal from the order granting the allowance or ask that it be set aside.[14]

A statutory limitation of the time within which creditors may proceed to set aside a judgment setting apart a year's support is sometimes found.[15]

[§ 874] Q. Rights of Heirs, Distributees, or Legatees. The allowance is good as against the distributees, heirs, or legatees of decedent, unless strong reasons are shown for setting it aside;[16] and where on the hearing of a petition for an order of sale to enforce a decree charging a widow's exemption on land, it appears that the prior proceedings are regular on their face, an heir may not attack the decree and demand a reinvestigation of the domicile of decedent at the time of his death, since such a decree is res judicata.[17] Neither is a widow to whom a family allowance has been paid accountable to the children after their majority for a share of what was not expended for their support.[18] Where a widow abandoned personal property to her children without claiming her exemption, the children could bring an action for its recovery without joining the widow as a party plaintiff.[19]

X. ALLOWANCE AND PAYMENT OF CLAIMS

[§ 875] A. Liabilities of Estate—1. Obligations of Decedent in General. So far as assets may have reached his hands in due course every executor or administrator is bound to administer the estate committed to him according to law, by paying the debts, claims, and charges upon it,[20] in their legal order of preference,[21] before paying legacies or making any distribution to the heirs.[22] This duty is enjoined upon him by law, by his oath and bond, and by a sound public policy, which treats each decedent's estate, except for the widow's or children's allowance,[23] as a fund, subject to all lawful debts of and demands against him, and to all reasonable charges consequent upon his death. Obligations incurred by decedent during his lifetime may in general be presented in the modes pointed out by local statute, against his executor or administrator and be duly enforced against the estate;[24] but in order for a claim to be allowed, it must appear that there is an actual indebtedness or a just claim for compensation [25] against decedent or his estate,[26] and it is only the legal, and not the

[a] Illustrations.—(1) Where a debt due one merchant was included in a mortgage taken by another from a joint customer, and the mortgage was not paid before the death of the mortgagee, the surviving merchant's debt cannot be proved against decedent's estate. Bender v. Wooten, 35 Ark. 31. (2) An unliquidated claim for breach of a covenant of warranty committed by an heir of the covenantor cannot be filed and allowed as a claim against the estate of the ancestor. Pastorious v. Davis, 9 Colo. A. 426, 48 P 833. (3) In order to recover against the estate of a decedent for funeral expenses of his wife or for her care and nursing, it must be shown that they were incurred on the credit of decedent, or with the intent to collect them from his estate, or that he promised to pay them. Johnson v. Kimball, 172 Mass. 398, 52 NE 386. (4) Where a wife placed money and property in the control of her husband, and he invested them, together with a greater amount of his own funds and conveyed to her the greater proportion of the property he procured, his estate after his death is not liable for the amount she placed in his hands, and hence she held no proper claim against his executors for the amount, although the investment was a failure resulting in a loss of the fund. Matter of Watson, 115 App. Div. 310, 100 NYS 993 [aff 187 N. Y. 541 mem, 80 NE 1122 mem]. (5) Sureties of an administrator who have been compelled to pay a debt against the estate, and have obtained against the administrator a judgment for the amount of such debt and the costs of the suit, are not entitled to have such judgment allowed by the probate court as a claim against the estate. Wernecke v. Kenyon, 66 Mo. 275. (6) Where the husband of testatrix, while a life tenant of her estate, used no part thereof for his support, an agreement between him and claimant for his care and support creates no legal liability against the estate of testatrix. Matter of Alden, 75 Misc. 436, 135 NYS 511. (7) Where a note indorsed by a decedent for a son, one of his executors, matures after decedent's death, and is not paid nor protested, and a renewal note made by the son indorsed by another son, also an executor, the son who indorses the second note is not entitled, after he has been compelled to pay the note, to recoup himself from his father's estate. Hildebrand's Est., 42 Pa. Super. 99. (8) An executor who, under a power in the will of his testator, enters into a contract to lease the real estate for a term of years, and dies without having executed the lease or given possession of the premises, does not render his own estate liable for the breach of such contract, and no action therefor can be maintained against his representatives. [a] Illustration.—An instrument by which decedent promises to pay to the order of "R. or family" a certain amount, although it may not be good as a promissory note because of the payee being in the alternative, is an enforceable claim of R against decedent's estate as a special contract for a sufficient consideration. Robbins v. Robbins, 175 Mo. A. 609, 158 SW 400.

[b] Where express words of limitation to the contrary are not found the presumption is that the promisor instance his contract for board and lodging,[30] to support another person,[31] to pay an annuity,[32] to pay for services rendered to a relative,[33] or to contribute money for the building of a church;[34] claims arising from decedent's breach of contract[35] or the failure of the consideration for a contract;[36] claims arising out of the relation of husband and wife[37] or the severance of such relation,[38] a judicial sale which has been set aside,[39] the receipt by decedent of money belonging to another,[40] the receipt of usury,[41] the payment of money for the benefit of decedent,[42] the liability of a life tenant to the remainderman,[43] the failure of a life tenant to pay taxes against the land,[44] the personal liability of a director[45] or stockholder[46] in a corporation, the execution of intends to bind his personal representatives; and hence, where a testator employed counsel to defend his brother in a certain action from beginning to end and to make the best defense possible, no restriction being placed on the counsel, the contract survived the testator and was enforceable against his executors. Barrett v. Towne, 196 Mass. 487, 82 NE 698, 13 LRANS 643.

[c] Support of child.—A contract with the mother for the support of the promisor's illegitimate child is binding on his executors. Stumpf's App., 116 Pa. 33, 8 A 866.

[d] Subsequent contract not affecting right of recovery on original contract.—Plaintiff conveyed a mining claim to decedent to sell and to pay one thousand five hundred dollars on the sale being made. Decedent made the sale and failed to pay plaintiff. Subsequently plaintiff agreed to accept three hundred dollars and a farm on decedent clearing the title thereto. Before perfecting the title decedent died, and plaintiff filed a claim against the estate on the original agreement, and the issue was limited to the purchase price of the claim at the time it was conveyed. It was held that his right of recovery was not affected by the subsequent agreement. Bull v. Payne, 47 Or. 580, 84 P 697.

[e] Contract of agency.—Where a decedent employed an agent to negotiate the purchase of mining property of a corporation, and before the agent had completed the purchase, the agency was terminated, but before its termination, the agent had, pursuant to the agreement, bought a great number of shares of the corporate stock which caused him financial loss, the agent had a provable claim for the loss sustained, although the agency was terminated. Briggs v. Chamberlain, 47 Colo. 382, 107 P 1082, 135 AmSR 223.

[f] The executor of an unauthorized agent is liable on the implied contract of the agent as to his authority. Collen v. Wright, 7 E. & B. 301, 90 ECL 301, 119 Reprint 1259 [aff 8 E. & B. 647, 92 ECL 647, 120 Reprint 241].

[g] Evidence not sufficiently definite.—Where, in a suit for services and expenditures made in caring for an infant at the request of defendant's intestate, it appeared that a large part of plaintiff's claim consisted of moneys expended, of which she had kept no account, evidence that, considering the care bestowed on the infant, the expenditures for food, clothing, etc., plaintiff regarded the reasonable value of her services and expenses at from nine dollars to ten dollars a week, was not sufficiently definite to entitle plaintiff to recover under a contract by intestate to pay, not a definite sum, but what was necessary for the support of the child. [a] Necessity for judgment against estate.—The claim of a judgment creditor of a corporation an appeal bond,[47] the use and occupation of property by decedent in his lifetime,[48] or a note or due bill of decedent.[49] Voluntary bonds or covenants are binding on the estate at common law, although postponed in order of payment to debts founded on a valuable consideration.[50] A check drawn[51] or note made[52] by a husband in favor of his wife which has not been presented or paid may be allowed against his estate. A penalty incurred by decedent on a contract made while living, or damages as for careless or wrongful performance or for a breach may be allowed against the estate.[53] A parol promise to pay a debt is sufficient to warrant a judgment against the assets of a decedent.[54] A personal obligation to pay an annuity secured by a deed of trust in which, as well as in his last will, the obligor manifests an intention to make it an exclusive charge against his real estate, has been held to be notwithstanding a proper claim for allowance against the estate.[55] Where a will recited that testator had in his possession thirteen thousand dollars in notes and contracts belonging to his wife, and provided that his estate should be responsible therefor to her, with interest from the date of the will, and the testator had managed his wife's property as her agent, and continued to do so after the date of the will, dividends on bank stock of the wife in the husband's possession, accruing after the date of the will, and which he had reinvested for her, not being part of the original debt, should not be allowed as a credit thereon, but should be an additional charge against the estate.[56]

[§ 876] 2. Secured Claims. Where a creditor holds pledge, mortgage, or other lien security on his own behalf, he has the option after his debtor's death to enforce such security for his own indemnity or to file his claim as a general creditor of the estate;[57] but where a decedent dies seized of land subject to a mortgage given by a prior owner, against the estate of a deceased stockholder is not provable in the probate court until it has been reduced to judgment against the estate. Douglass v. Loftus, 85 Kan. 720, 119 P 74, AnnCas1913A 378, LRA 1915B 797.

[a] Note presented to wife.—A widow holding a note of her husband which was given to her by her father as her separate estate is entitled to the same rights and privileges, to the extent of such note, as his other creditors. Martin v. Curd, 1 Bush (Ky.) 327.

[b] Presumption as to payment.—Where a note and a check drawn by a husband in favor of his wife some time before his death are in her possession at the time of his death, and are afterward presented by her executors as claims against his estate, the fact that he was at all times able to pay them raises no presumption that they were paid, nor does the fact that she was her husband's executrix raise any presumption that they had been paid, and that she took them from among his papers after his death. Womrath's Est., 23 Wkly NC (Pa.) 434.

[b] Breach by administrator.—Where decedent held lands as security for advancements to claimant, and they agreed that decedent should sell the lands or the timber therefrom to pay the debt and certain commissions, and that whatever land remained after such payments should be owned by decedent and claimant in common, a breach of the agreement by decedent's administrator did not give rise to a claim against the estate of which the probate court had jurisdiction, but claimant's remedy was in equity for an accounting of the trust. [b] A decedent's undertaking to assume an encumbrance on land purchased by him creates a debt enforceable against his estate. Pate v. Oliver, 104 N. C. 458, 10 SE 709.

[c] One suing to surcharge an administratrix's settlement cannot complain because a chattel mortgagee was permitted to prove his claim against the estate instead of foreclosing, since adoption of the latter method would have increased the expense. Avey v. Stearman, 145 Ky. 574, 140 SW 1055.

[d] Allowance of attorney's fees.—A mortgagee may present his mortgage to an auditor of the orphans' court for allowance during the pendency of a scire facias sur mortgage in the court of common pleas, such mortgage is not a debt of decedent which can be paid out of his personal estate in the absence of a contract by him assuming the mortgage debt,[58] and such debt has been held not payable out of decedent's personal estate even though he covenanted with his vendor to pay it.[59] Where a will made no provision for payment of indebtedness other than for testator's last illness and funeral expenses, payment by the executor of a note secured by mortgage on land conveyed by the testator to his wife by a deed of gift containing no reference to the mortgage was not proper.[60]

[§ 877] 3. Joint Obligations.[61] At common law, where one of two or more joint contractors or obligors dies, the survivor alone is held liable;[62] but equity will charge the estate of decedent where some good reason therefor is shown,[63] such as the insolvency of the survivor,[64] or his inability to discharge the indebtedness,[65] and in a number of states the common-law rule has been changed by statute so as to permit the creditor or obligee to enforce his claim against the estate of decedent.[66] A joint obligor with decedent who has paid the entire amount has been held entitled to contribution as against decedent's estate.[67]

Where the obligation is joint and several, the estate of a deceased obligor is liable the same as he would be if living.[68]

[§ 878] 4. Services Rendered to Decedent—a. In General—(1) Where Payment Promised or Expected.[69] A claim for services rendered to decedent may be allowed against his estate, whether such services were rendered upon an express contract for a fixed payment, or merely as meritorious and needful, without any express contract, but with the expectation of reasonable compensation there-and the auditor may not only allow the amount of the mortgage debt, but also the attorney's commissions specified in the mortgage. Rowe's Est., 22 Pa. Super. 597.

[e] Surrender or exhaustion of lien.—(1) A mortgage creditor of a decedent cannot prove his claim against the estate without either surrendering his mortgage lien, or exhausting it by sale and applying the proceeds thereof toward the debt. Macgill v. Hyatt, 80 Md. 253, 30 A 710. (2) One holding a mortgage on land of an intestate may not insist that the mortgage shall be paid out of personalty, to the exoneration of the realty, but must first enforce his lien, looking to the personal estate only for any deficiency. Moore v. Dunn, 92 N. C. 63.

"At common law the death of one of two joint contractors severs the promise and renders the survivor liable thereon, as on his several promise. In such case, the survivor only can be sued on the contract, and the executor or administrator of the deceased party, if sued, may plead the survivorship in bar, or give it in evidence on a trial of the merits." [a] Circumstances raising obligation to pay. — Where services by plaintiff were acknowledged by decedent, who exacted a promise that these services should be continued to his wife after his death, with the direction that the wife make suitable provision for the services rendered and to be rendered, a binding contract is made and a debt created against the estate for services performed after as well as before the death of decedent. Gogreve v. Day, 30 Oh. Cir. Ct. 609.

[b] The mere rendition and acceptance of services is sufficient to raise an obligation on the part of a decedent to pay therefor in the absence of proof that they were not to be paid for. Wallace v. Schaud, 81 Md. 594, 32 A 324.

[c] A promise in writing to compensate one for her kindness, in an amount out of proportion to the services rendered, constitutes a valid claim against decedent's estate. Matter of Todd, 47 Misc. 35, 95 NYS 211.

[d] Services rendered to a person as nurse during his illness may constitute a claim against his estate, although there is no direct evidence that such services were rendered at his express request. Circumstances surrounding the transaction, or a request by the family or physician of the sick person, may be equivalent to his direct request. Todd v. Martin, 4 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 805, 37 P 872.

[e] Expectation of compensation through inheritance by wife.—Where plaintiff furnished defendant's testator with board and money, not as a gift, but with the expectation that it was to create a liability for its repayment, and the testator did not understand that what he received was intended as a mere gratuity, plaintiff's right to recover therefor was not taken away by the fact that he expected that his actual reimbursement would come through his wife's inheritance from the testator, and that he did not look forward to obtaining reimbursement from any other source. Wirth v. Kuehn, 191 Mass. 51, 77 NE 641.

[f] Void contract with wife of decedent.—Although the nursing of a husband was performed under a contract with the wife void because of her inability to contract, his estate was liable for the services under an implied promise. Flannery v. Chidgey, 33 Tex. Civ. A. 638, 77 SW 1034.

[g] Medical services to decedent's children.—Where medical services rendered to a woman's children are recognized by her as constituting a liability against her, her husband and executor may after her death pay such bills out of her estate. Baker v. Baker, 87 Va. 180, 12 SE 346.

[j] Where a servant performed extra services with the expectation and on the promise that she should receive a certain sum at her employer's death, she is entitled to recover that sum, although she would have performed the services without any promise of payment. lifetime will not necessarily defeat a claim against his estate for meritorious and valuable services performed at his request,[75] and so where services are rendered in the first instance with the expectation of payment, but the claimant refrains from presenting the claim in the expectation of receiving a legacy, he may still recover for his services, if such expectation is disappointed.[76] But where a claim for services or board is first made after the decease of the alleged debtor, the presumption obtains that payment was made or that it was not intended to demand payment,[77] and evidence to establish a claim for services against a decedent's estate not made during his lifetime must be other than mere loose declarations, and must clearly and distinctly establish a contract between claimant and decedent.[78]

Care of lunatic. Services in caring for, nursing, and administering to the health and comfort of a lunatic are necessaries, which are recoverable after her death against her estate.[79]

[§ 879] (2) Voluntary Services. Compensation cannot be allowed for services which were performed without any claim for payment during decedent's lifetime, or any expectation of being paid specifically therefor, and without any express or implied promise of remuneration, even though their performance may have been prompted by the hope of obtaining a gift or legacy which has not been fulfilled;[80] and a direction on the part of decedent

"There was no contract while the services were being rendered, and plaintiff had no right to claim pay for them upon finding that the income of the money only and not the principal had been bequeathed to her." Mooney v. Grant, supra.

[a] Statement of claimant that services gratuitous.—Where a claim for services for nursing is filed against a decedent's estate, the claimant's declaration to a third person that she was serving decedent solely from the love she bore to him will bar her claim, when made in reply to the repeated proposals of decedent's brother to furnish a nurse, and when no proof is given to the value or duration of the services. Engle's Est., 9 Pa. Dist. 743.

[b] Circumstances not raising implied promise to pay. — Where claimant, who long had been intimately associated with decedent, at one time being in his employment as a laborer, and then as renter of his land for many years, in the last sickness of deceased went to his house unasked and unsolicited, even though gratefully received, as his friendship with deceased warranted, and entered the sick chamber to nurse deceased as a friend, while deceased was surrounded by his family and other friends who were anxious to serve him, and no stipulation was made that the service of claimant should be paid for, no promise will be implied. Teawalt v. Ramey, 103 Va. 42, 48 SE 505.

[c] Claim asserted as mere afterthought.—Testator left money in trust for his daughter, but the will provided that, if she should refuse to become a member of the executor's family, the fund was to go to the executor's son. The executor paid the money over to his son, and in an action by the daughter the defense was that she had refused to become a member of the executor's family, but it was held on appeal that the provisions of the will had not been complied with, in that the executor had not used proper diligence to have the daughter become a member of his family; and, on remand of the cause, the executor answered that the son had a claim on the estate, arising on contract between the son and testator, whereby he was to be paid for the nursing of the testator, which claim exceeded the amount of the trust fund paid over to the son. The executor had not required any proof of such claim from the son, and the action was not commenced by the daughter until ten years after testator's death, during which time nothing was heard of the claim. It was held that the defense as to the son's claim was a mere afterthought, and of no avail to defendant. Finley v. Keinningham, 79 SW 236, 25 KyL 1955.

[d] Expressions of decedent's gratitude for what claimants had done for him, and of a purpose to compensate them, by leaving them to his executors to pay for services voluntarily rendered to decedent will not create a claim against the estate,[81] nor will the expression by decedent of an intention to pay therefor have this effect.[82] The rule is not changed by the fact that the services were rendered under a mistake as to the conditions existing;[83] but where persons were induced to support a decedent for several years by her fraudulent pretense that she was destitute, the fact being otherwise, they were held entitled to be compensated out of her estate.[84]

[§ 880] (3) Where Services Compensated for. Where services have been fully paid for in the lifetime of decedent, there cannot of course be any further recovery on that account against the estate,[85] and where the claimant has received a stated sum periodically for wages or salary, in payment of board or otherwise, the presumption is against a larger allowance, unless decedent is shown to have agreed accordingly.[86] So also, a sufficient legacy or devise to a person who has performed services for decedent may discharge a claim for such services.[87]

(2) Where claimant's husband contracted with her paralyzed brother's committee to take care of the brother at their home for thirty-five dollars a month, and after four years had the compensation increased to thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents, which was paid until the afflicted man's death, claimant could not recover from the estate for taking care of him and nursing him while he was at her house, it appearing such service was contemplated by her husband's contract. Carr v. Calvert, 102 SW 282, 31 KyL 303. (3) In an action against a decedent's estate to recover twenty-five dollars per week for nursing him during his last illness, she cannot recover, where during that time she was employed at two dollars per week, without evidence of an express contract to pay for the nursing, and loose declarations made by decedent, indefinite understandings, and anticipated benefactions are insufficient for that purpose. Wise v. Martin, 232 Pa. 159, 81 A 184. (4) Where a husband entered into a contract with an aged man to move his family into the latter's house and take care of him, and his family was to have the use of half of the house and the husband was to receive thirty dollars a month, and his wife assisted in the performance of the services for which the contract was made, some of which were of an unpleasant character, and the wife occasionally received the monthly payments, and never objected to their sufficiency or claimed anything for nursing, she could not recover after the death of the owner compensation for nursing and otherwise caring for decedent during his life. Normile v. Osborne, 207 Pa. 367, 56 A 937.

[b] Housekeeper.—Where a person was employed by a decedent at fixed wages as housekeeper, such person cannot recover against decedent's estate additional compensation for nursing, in the absence of an express contract to that effect, or an agreement to provide for such compensation by a legacy. Piersol's Est., 27 Pa. Super. 204.

[c] A domestic servant and nurse, who has received fixed wages for her services as such, cannot recover for extra services in the absence of an express contract. Grossman v. Thunder, 212 Pa. 274, 61 A 904.

[d] Statement by decedent that compensation insufficient.—A claim for extra compensation for nursing decedent, in addition to the compensation for services for general housework, cannot be sustained on expressions and indications of belief by decedent that plaintiff was not sufficiently paid under her contract for housework, these not constituting a new contract. Howard v. Drexler, 14 Pa. Super. 59.

[e] An instrument signed merely by decedent reciting "I . . . being of sound mind, desire that Mrs. Susanna Stadermann, for her sacrifices day and night and diligent nursing for me, receive two hundred and fifty dollars," while prima facie an evidence of indebtedness, was shown not to be so by the fact that said party had no connection with its execution, and was at the time engaged in nursing deceased at an agreed rate per week. Stadermann v. Heins, 78 App. Div. (N. Y.) 563, 79 NYS 674.

[f] Where presumption does not arise.—Where a parent whose diseased condition required constant care was boarded and cared for by his son and daughter-in-law, the fact that he paid his board gave rise to no presumption that this payment was intended as full satisfaction for all services rendered him. Fry v. Fry, 119 Mo. A. 476, 94 SW 990.

The courts regard with suspicion and disfavor claims brought against an estate for personal services rendered by relatives, especially where the latter are members of decedent's immediate family or household, as the presumption is that such services between persons occupying such relations are intended to be gratuitous,[88] and hence claims against the estate of a decedent made by near relatives for personal services require stronger proof to establish did get a legacy. It is true that by the residuary clause she and the other executor take the residue, and it is also true that there may be something in the residue; but I have argued the case in vain if that circumstance is not wholly irrelevant. The case is not that there was an agreement or understanding between Mrs. Ansley [decedent] and Mrs. Chesley that the latter was to be remunerated by a legacy, and behold she has a legacy. It is this: that at most Mrs. Chesley expected a legacy; she expected as the testatrix' property in fact; but there was no understanding or agreement between them that she was to be remunerated in this way").

[a] Reason of rule.—"Justice does not require that a contract to pay should be implied where it is apparent that ample compensation has already been made by will, and when it is obvious that there was no expectation of payment by either party." Gillette's App., 82 Conn. 500, 504, 74 A 762.

N. S.—Sherry v. Waddell, 27 N. S. 312.

[a] "It is a rule universally recognized that, when the services are rendered by one who is a member of the family of the employer, the law will not imply a contract to pay for the services from the mere fact that they have been rendered upon the one hand and the benefits thereof received upon the other, as in the case of strangers. This is also held to be the rule when there is no actual blood relationship existing between the parties, provided they sustain to each other the ordinary relations of members of the same family." It has been held, however, that, when the family relationship exists, it is not necessary to prove the terms of a direct and positive contract. Morrisey v. Faucett, 28 Wash. 52, 61, 68 P 352 [quot Hodge v. Hodge, 47 Wash. 196, 198, 91 P 264, 11 LRANS 873].

[b] The doctrine rests upon the idea of the mutual dependence of those who are members of one immediate family, and such a family may exist, although composed of remote them than ordinary claims by strangers.[89] The rule applies when the family relationship actually existed between claimant and decedent, although there was neither consanguinity, affinity, nor adoption.[90]

This rule has been applied to a claim by a child against the estate of a parent[91] or one standing in relations or even of persons between whom there is no tie of blood. The application of the rule is not limited by a mere proprinquity of kindred. Disbrow v. Durand, 54 N. J. L. 343, 24 A 545, 33 AmSR 678.

[c] Illustrations.—(1) Where a family consisted of a father, mother, brother, and three sisters living on a farm belonging to the brother, one of the sisters enjoying the same conveniences as the other members of the family, and sharing the work of the common home and assisting in the work of the household in the same manner as her other sisters, will be presumed, in the absence of any express promise, to have worked gratuitously, and the services cannot form the foundation of a claim against the estate of the brother after his death. Matter of Schmidt, 68 Misc. 13, 124 NYS 856. (2) A claimant for services rendered a decedent was induced to render the services by the fact that, when he was a homeless orphan, decedent had cared for him. Decedent paid a sum as surety for claimant while he and his wife were living with decedent. Claimant took the place of a son in the household of decedent, and, apart from decedent occupying his rooms, the manner of living of the parties was that of a single family. Claimant kept no account either of the boarding of decedent or of any services rendered to him by way of nursing. Claimant, while living in the home of decedent, and while the parties were living together as members of one family, was faithful. It was held not to raise an implication of a promise of decedent to pay for services rendered. Irwin v. Jones, 46 Ind. A. 588, 92 NE 787.

[d] Adult member of family.—When a member of the family, after he is twenty-one, continues to live with the family, and thereupon and thereafter renders services, the law will not imply a promise to pay for the services. Matter of Milligan, 112 App. Div. 373, 98 NYS 480.

[e] Whether the family relation in fact exists where a person not a relative is taken into the family of another must be determined from the particular facts of the case. Boyd v. Starbuck, 18 Ind. A. 210, 47 NE 1079.

[f] "The burden is on him (1) who claims a money recompense for personal services performed, whether voluntary, or upon the request of the other, to establish a contract, expressed or implied, for such consideration." Saunders, 80 Conn. 19, 21, 66 A 785.

[a] An express contract must be proved, or it must be shown that at the time the service was rendered both parties intended and expected that the service was to be paid for, and in such cases stricter proof is required than in other cases. Humble v. Humble, 152 Ky. 160, 153 SW 249.

"The legal presumption of a promise to pay for services rendered by one person at the request of another, where there is no contract or agreement for compensation, is reversed when the services are rendered by a child to its parent. . . . But this is only a presumption of fact which may be overcome by evidence of an express promise by the parent to pay for the services, or where the evidence shows the child rendered the services in expectation of payment and the parent intended to pay for them." Stone v. Troll, 134 Mo. A. 308, 311, 114 SW 82.

[a] Reasons for rule.—(1) "It is well settled here and elsewhere, that between parent and child, there can be no recovery by the child for the board of the parent or for services rendered him by the child, in the absence of an express agreement therefor. Although a son may render services to his parent, the law regards such services as but the performance of a filial duty, which every man owes his parents, and implies no contract for compensation therefor." Meyers v. Meyers, 141 Ala. 343, 346, 37 S 451. (2) "A son finding his aged mother dangerously ill and unable to care for herself, being himself comfortably situated and abundantly able financially to do so, takes her to his home and makes her a member of his household, there treating her in all respects as an affectionate son would treat his mother, and repeatedly assuring her that she was always welcome to a home with him, and never intimating that she was expected to or should in justice pay him for board, lodging, or care. It seems to us that the natural inference of any reasonable person would be that neither of the parties would expect for a moment that pecuniary compensation by one to the other was contemplated by either, and certainly that the son was prompted by no such sordid motive in thus caring for his mother, even though she had property amounting in value to ten thousand dollars, and had been living in another place for some years." Crane v. Derrick, 157 Cal. 667, 672, 109 P 31.

[b] A claim by an adopted son for services will not be allowed, even though the adoption papers are defective. Martin v. Martin, 108 Wis. 284, 84 NW 439, 81 AmSR 895.

"There is a presumption that the kindly services rendered by a foster daughter to her foster father during his last illness are gratuitous, and the law will not allow recovery for such services in the absence of an express promise to pay for them, or the presence of such circumstances as will be equivalent to such a promise." Daste's Succ., supra.

[a] Where a father bound his six year old child to another until she was twenty one years of age, with the right to control and have the services of such child until that time, and the person to whom the child was bound agreed to give her one hundred dollars when she became of age, and the employer died when the child was sixteen years of age, neither the child nor the father could recover from the estate of the deceased employer, where the services were of no greater value than what was done and received by her. Gaithers v. Lee, 135 Ga. 375, 69 SE 477.

[b] Value of services exceeding value of education and support.—Where one assumes the relation of a parent to a child not of kin, taken at the age of three years, and faithfully discharges the duties of that relation by receiving the child into his family, educating and supporting her, and there is no express agreement to pay her wages, she cannot sue such person's executors for services rendered decedent while a minor, although the value of such services may exceed the expenses of her education and support. Howard v. Randolph, 134 Ga. 691, 68 SE 586, 29 LRANS 294, 20 Ann Cas 392.

[a] Illustration.—Where one lives from her birth to her marriage with her grandfather, as a member of his family, he furnishing board and clothing, and she rendering services, it is presumed that the necessities and comforts so furnished by him and the services so rendered by her were gratuitously furnished and done, so that his estate is not entitled to money received by him as trustee for her for what he so furnished her. Lewis v. Hershey, 45 Ind. A. 104, 90 NE 332.

Shutts v. Franke, 42 Ind. A. 275, 85 NE 781.

[b] Where deceased did not stand in loco parentis with plaintiffs, and they were not members of his family, at the time they were called to attend him in his last illness, the presumption of an implied promise by deceased to pay for such services was not rebutted by the fact that he was their grandfather. [a] Services as physician.—The brother of a decedent can recover from the estate for his services as physician only the usual charge, and not for an uninterrupted attendance and service, it appearing that he slept and ate at the house, and went in and out at his pleasure. Moffett's Est., 11 Phila. (Pa.) 79.

[b] A claim for care of testator's wife by her sister could not be sustained against testator's estate, in the absence of an agreement to pay therefor where the circumstances indicated that the services were intended at the time to be gratuitous. Matter of Stiles, 64 Misc. 658, 120 NYS 714.

[c] Circumstances under which presumption does not arise.—Where sisters have not lived together and are dependent on their labor for their livelihood, and one furnishes board and services to her sick sister until her death, there is no presumption that the services were gratuitous. Matter of Lannon, 75 Misc. 66, 134 NYS 974.

[d] Contrary view.—In an action by a sister of a decedent against his administrator for washing done for deceased and for nursing him in his last illness, evidence that these services were performed is sufficient to justify a recovery, the burden being on defendant to show that they were rendered gratuitously. [a] Old and helpless mother-in-law.—Where a mother-in-law entered a family and became one of them, supervising the children in place of her deceased daughter, and acted as a grandmother would in a house where there were children, and the relation existed for over twenty years without any agreement as to board, or any payment thereof, and she finally became helpless and was an absolute charge for eighteen months after she reached the age of eighty years, the son-in-law was entitled to reasonable pay for her support and care during such eighteen months for under such circumstances there was no presumption that the services were gratuitous, but there was an implied contract to pay for them, and the necessary expense was a proper charge against her estate, but he was not entitled to recover for board furnished before she became helpless. Henderson v. McLain, 146 N. C. 329, 59 SE 873.

[b] The relationship of stepson-in-law and stepmother-in-law living together is too remote to raise the presumption that they were living together for mutual convenience, and that services rendered the stepmother-in-law by the stepson-in-law were gratuitous, and the rule that much stricter proof is required to establish a contract of one of such persons to pay for services rendered by the other, in enforcing claim against decedent's estate, than in ordinary cases, does not apply. nephew or niece,[7] and a claim by a grandnephew or grandniece against a granduncle or grandaunt.[8] So also, where decedent, after retiring from business, went to reside with his sisters, and furnished a part of the coal and provisions, he was under no obligation to support any of the members of the household, including a ward of one of his deceased sisters, and was not the head of the family so as to render his estate responsible for services rendered therein by the ward.[9] The relationship of cousins between claimant and decedent may be sufficient to raise the presumption where the family relation also existed[10] but not otherwise.[11]

The fact that claimant was under no legal obligation to furnish support or services to his deceased relative is immaterial,[12] a moral obligation being sufficient.[13]

[§ 882] (2) When Payment Allowed. The presumption that services rendered to a person in the family relation were intended to be gratuitous is rebuttable,[14] and a person standing in such relation to a decedent may recover for his services where there was an express contract or promise of the decedent to pay therefor,[15] either written or

[c] A person who has supported and cared for one relative at the request of another and upon the promise of the latter to pay therefor has a valid claim against the estate of the latter for compensation. Grimm v. Taylor, 96 Mich. 5, 55 NW 447; In re Payne, 204 Pa. 535, 54 A 337.

[d] Absence of demand.—Where services were rendered by a niece to her aunt for four years periodically up to the time of the aunt's death, there is no presumption of payment, or of the absence of a contract to pay, because no demand for payment is shown to have been made before decedent's death, a promise to pay being shown, and claimant not depending on these services for a living. Ewing's Est., 18 LancLRev (Pa.) 73.

[e] Promise rebuts presumption that services were gratuitous.—Eppert v. Gardiner, 48 Ind. A. 188, 93 NE 550.

[f] A contract for payment out of decedent's estate is sufficient, and it is not necessary that there should have been a contract on which complainant could have sued in decedent's lifetime. Hobin v. Hobin, 33 R. I. 249, 80 A 595.

[g] An agreement by a father to pay his daughter a stated sum weekly for her services as housekeeper was sufficient to establish a claim against the estate. Matter of Milligan, 112 App. Div. 373, 98 NYS 480.

[h] Full performance prevented by death of decedent.—Where the understanding between plaintiff and her father was that she should remain at home and assist him in the care of the house, farm, and stock, and help pay off the debts, and that when the debts were paid off he would compensate her for her services, and she performed services accordingly, she is entitled to compensation from his estate, although his death before the debts were paid made it impossible for her to complete the agreement. Harrison v. Harrison, 124 Iowa 525, 100 NW 344.

[i] Contract to pay for past services.—A contract by a father to pay his adult son one thousand dollars for past services and twenty dollars per month for future services is supported by a valid consideration. Olson v. Olson, 149 Wis. 248, 135 NW 836.

[j] Certainty of promise.—On a claim against an estate for personal services by decedent's granddaughter while living in his family, she was bound to prove a promise to pay, but not a promise to pay certain sums, at certain times, for certain services. Hobin v. Hobin, 33 R. I. 249, 80 A 595.

[k] Promise too vague to support claim.—The promise made by deceased to plaintiff's mother that if plaintiff would come and live with deceased, she would do a good part for plaintiff, is too vague to constitute an agreement on which plaintiff could recover against the estate for services performed while living with deceased. McMorrow v. Dowell, 116 Mo. A. 289, 90 SW 728.

[l] Notice of intention to charge.—Where a mother-in-law promised to pay her son-in-law for her board, it is not essential to his right to recover from her estate that he should have notiffed her that he intended to charge therefor. White v. Almy, 34 R. I. 29, 82 A 397.

[a] Facts raising implied promise of payment.—During the last few years of deceased's life, especially the last few months, the attendance of a male nurse was necessary, and the duties of the nurse were unpleasant and in frequent requisition. Claimant, a nephew, lived near him, and, with another nephew of deceased, performed the duties of nurse. Deceased frequently sent for his nephews, and they frequently attended him without being sent for, anticipating the necessity of going to him. The visits were necessary several times a day, and often at night, claimant rendering the greater service. It was held sufficient to raise an implied contract with deceased for payment for claimant's services. Lewis v. Lewis, 75 Ark. 191, 87 SW 134.

[b] That parent and child did not live together in the family relation is a circumstance to be regarded in determining whether there was an implied promise to pay for services rendered by the child. Foote v. Hoffman, 200 Mich. 464, 166 NW 924, LRA1918D 400; Page v. Page, 73 N. H. 305, 61 A 356, 6 AnnCas 510; Winkler v. Killian, 121 N. C. 575, 54 SE 540, 115 AmSR 694; Wessinger v. Roberts, 67 S. C. 240, 45 SE 169.

[c] The nature of the services is an important factor in determining whether it is to be regarded as gratuitous. Wessinger v. Roberts, 67 S. C. 240, 45 SE 169.

[d] Professional services, rendered in the usual course of business, are not presumed to be intended to be gratuitous. Valentine v. Valentine, 4 Redf. Surr. (N. Y.) 265.

[e] Extraordinary and menial services.—"This court has recognized a distinction between ordinary services performed by the wife of the son of an intestate and services of an extraordinary and menial kind. Frailey v. Thompson, 49 SW 13, 20 KyL 1179. As to the latter services covering a long period of years there is no presumption that they are a gratuity, and it is not necessary to prove an express contract by stricter proof than is required in other cases. Here the intestate was confined to his bed for several years. He could not control his bowels, and frequently could not control his kidneys. Often his bed had to be changed. Not only that, but he had a syphilitic gangrene on his feet and other parts of his body. Appellee had to change his bed clothing and bathe his body. In doing this she incurred danger of infection. While compensation therefor;[18] and where, although decedent and claimant were relatives, the relation was not such as imposed any special obligation on claimant of support of, care for, or tenderness toward decedent, a claim for compensation will be more favorably regarded, and in a suitable case upheld, especially where decedent and claimant did not live together.[19] But a mere expectation of a child that he will be provided for by his father's will is not sufficient to support a claim for compensation for services,[20] nor will declarations of intention on the part of decedent, which are not communicated to the claimant, suffice.[21] Neither will a claim for compensation be sufficiently supported by decedent's mere expressions of gratitude and a desire to compensate where such expressions fall short of indicating any contract for payment.[22]

[§ 883] c. In Whose Favor Claim Exists. Where decedent had resided with a husband and wife, but was not shown to have had knowledge of the fact that the husband had told his wife that she could have the money derived from decedent's board, the implied contract to pay for such board was to pay to the husband as the head of the family, and not to the wife.[23]

[§ 884] d. Nature of Claim. A claim against an estate for services performed at the request of decedent and with his knowledge, and alleging that they were worth a stated sum, is not a claim on an express contract, but is a claim on quantum meruit, and is supported by proof of performance now and then some one was employed to assist her, it appears that no one else could be gotten who was willing to perform these services for any length of time. It is not shown that any of intestate's other children ever volunteered to wait on him, or did perform any of the services performed by appellee. She bore this unusual burden without the assistance of any of the other members of the family. For such extraordinary and menial services as appellee performed, we think the proof is sufficient to show that they were performed with the expectation both on her part and on the part of the intestate that she should be paid therefor." Humble v. Humble, 152 Ky. 160, 163, 153 SW 249. To similar effect Durr v. Durr, 82 SW 581, 26 KyL 855 [reh den 83 SW 629, 26 KyL 1235].

[f] Demands on express and on implied contracts not inconsistent.—A demand by an adult child for compensation for services rendered a deceased parent, based on an actual contract between the parties, and a demand based on the theory of a contract implied by law binding the parent who was insane, to pay for the services, are not inconsistent. Hartley v. Hartley, 173 Mo. A. 18, 25, 155 SW 1099, 1101 ("Both are contracts equally valid in the law—the one an actual contract, and the other a strictly implied one—and by virtue of each an identical liability may be entailed, that is, to respond for the reasonable value of services or goods furnished which are actually necessary").

[a] Illustration.—While it is the general rule that no allowance will ordinarily be made to either a father or mother out of the estate of their deceased minor children for their past maintenance and support, yet where it appears that a mother was furnishing such support, and has no estate, or an estate small and trifling in comparison to that of the minor, and that the maintenance given to the minor for his benefit was under circumstances practically coercive on the mother, and that in doing so she was compelled to assume a burden not naturally and legally hers alone, such allowance may be made. Spink v. Spink, 28 Oh. Cir. Ct. 94.

[b] Detriment to claimant.—A sister, who cared for her brother at her home during his last illness, nursing him and performing for him unpleasant menial services, his presence at her home being of no benefit to her, but a positive detriment, was entitled to enforce her claim for nursing and menial services against her brother's estate. Mark v. Boardman, 89 SW 481, 28 KyL 455, 1 LRA NS 819.

[c] Care of idiot sister.—Where in a suit to establish a claim for services rendered by claimant to her deceased sister, it appeared that deceased was an idiot, and had been so during her entire life, that for a number of years she was almost helpless, that she and claimant lived together, and that all the wants of the deceased were supplied by claimant, claimant was held entitled to such compensation as the deceased would have accorded claimant, if she had acquired full possession of her mental faculties before her death, and had possessed an ordinary sense of justice. Key v. Harris, 116 Tenn. 161, 92 SW 235, 8 AnnCas 200.

[d] Even a near relative may be allowed for services to, or support of, the decedent in the absence of any express or implied contract on his part to pay, where the claimant is under no obligation to furnish such services or support and the circumstances show such allowance to be just, as in a case of support and maintenance by a mother of an adult son possessed of means but incapable of taking care of himself or his property by reason of intemperance. Strawbridge's App., 5 Whart. (Pa.) 568.

[§ 885] e. Amount of Allowance.[25] Where the services rendered were based upon an express contract for a specified remuneration such contract must govern,[26] even though the agreed compensation is unusually high;[27] but where the services are rendered merely upon an implied contract to pay or in the expectation of compensation, such compensation as is reasonable under the circumstances will be allowed,[28] and the allowance is not governed by the value which the claimant has placed upon his services in making his claim,[29] or the amount for which the claim is placed upon the account of the representative.[30]

The fact that a fixed monthly allowance was paid and accepted for a long time will not bar a larger allowance for caring for an aged person for a later period during which the services were more onerous by reason of his illness and the usual allowance was not paid.[31]

Consideration of use of property by claimant. Where an adult child, living apart from the home of his parent, rendered services for the parent and used her property, it was held that in the absence of fraud or gross neglect his claim against her estate for compensation should be reduced only by what he actually received from the use of the property, and not what he could have received by more diligent management.[32]

Interest may be allowed where the services have extended over a long period.[33]

Services by persons other than claimant. A claimant is not entitled to recover for additional services by her husband and son where there is nothing in the implied contract arising out of the facts in evidence authorizing her to employ third persons to render services to decedent.[34]

[§ 886] f. Agreement to Compensate by Will.[35] An agreement of decedent whereby he undertook to compensate another out of his estate for services rendered, or to be rendered, binds his estate, and the person who renders the services, failing to receive the promised legacy or bequest, may claim a reasonable recompense from the estate,[36] and even

"We think the true measure is such sum as the jury might from the evidence find plaintiff's services to have been reasonably worth." Green v. Teutschmann, 97 SW 7, 29 KyL 1149.

[a] Matters to be considered.—(1) Where a neighbor had rendered personal attendance and service to decedent, and decedent had agreed to pay therefor, the value of the services is not to be measured by those of an ordinary house servant, who receives not only wages, but also board and lodging, but the additional labor in going to decedent whenever her services should be required must be considered. McDonough's Est., 6 Pa. Co. 527. (2) Where a claim was filed against decedent's estate for attendance and services during the lifetime and last sickness of decedent, the relations of the parties and the circumstances under which the services were rendered might be shown, and the sum usually paid to persons who render services for hire, and the ordinary charges for rooms and board were not necessarily controlling. Luizzi v. Brady, 140 Mich. 73, 103 NW 574. (3) Where decedent allowed his son to plant an orchard and put other costly improvements on a farm as though it belonged to the son, it was inequitable, on settling decedent's estate, to charge the son with full rental value of the farm, and allow him to set off merely the cost of the trees and the planting thereof, without regard to their value when in full bearing, and the care and attention bestowed on them for years. Lightner v. Speck, (Va.) 28 SE 326. (4) The value of the succession may be considered by the court in fixing the fees due by a succession for professional services of physicians. Haley's Succ., 50 La. Ann. 840, 24 S 285. (5) If plaintiff contracted to take care of and wait on defendant's decedent, and plaintiff, her husband and children, lived with decedent, plaintiff could not recover for anything furnished by her for the support of the family, or consumed by herself, her husband and children, as it was the husband's duty to support them, nor could plaintiff be chargeable with what she had received as a gift from decedent, but would be chargeable with whatever he may have paid her for her services in taking care of and waiting on him; and if plaintiff contracted with defendent's decedent to go to his home, care for him and wait on him, and if the cooking of his meals and serving thereof was part of her duty under the contract in taking care of him and waiting on him, she could recover therefor, the cooking and serving of the meals in such a case not being a mere boarding of decedent by plaintiff. Belcher v. Craine, 135 Ga. 73, 68 SE 839.

[b] Wages in customary vocation.—Services rendered by a sister in the last illness of her sister will be based on the wages she received in her customary vocation of cook, in the absence of evidence as to value. Matter of Lannon, 75 Misc. 66, 134 NYS 974.

36. Colo.—Taylor v. Wilder, 165 P

though a parol agreement of this kind would be void under the statute of frauds, it is sufficient foundation for a claim against the promisor's estate.[37] The promise must, however, have been definite,[38] as well as contractual and irrevocable.[39] But where deceased agreed to make a will in plaintiff's favor in consideration of his performing certain services, plaintiff's recovery cannot be defeated on the ground of his breach where decedent acquiesced in the modification of the contract.[40] If the promise has been fulfilled, the claimant cannot claim anything further,[41] but even though a legacy has been left to the claimant, if such legacy is clearly insufficient to compensate for the services rendered, additional compensation may be allowed.[42]

Amount. It has been held that where the agreement of decedent was specific as to the amount which the claimant should receive, such amount should be allowed without regard to the actual value of the services,[43] but where there is a mere gen-

"In such circumstances, the party rendering services is entitled to compensation as a creditor of the estate for the value of the services whether the failure to make the agreed compensation arose from accident or design." Bair v. Hager, 97 App. Div. 358, 359, 90 NYS 27, 15 NYAnnCas 283.

[a] Nature of contract to compensate by will.—Where plaintiff went to live with decedent, upon her request to come and live with her and care for her in her declining years and upon decedent's promise to provide proper compensation in her will, the contract for her services was an implied contract. Gillan v. O'Leary, 124 App. Div. 498, 108 NYS 1024.

[b] Revocation of will by birth of issue.—The principle stated in the text is applicable where the employer executes a will providing for the agreed compensation, which is revoked by his subsequent marriage and the birth of issue. [c] Will lost or destroyed.—Where a father agreed to compensate his son by leaving his property to him if the son would take care of the father during his declining years, the son may maintain an action on the quantum meruit, even though the father made a will devising the property, it appearing that the will was lost or destroyed, and could not be found after the father's death. Pool v. Pool, 21 Wyo. 435, 133 P 372.

[d] Action need not be based on breach of agreement.—Where services rendered were not gratuitous, but under an understanding that compensation should be made by will, which was not done, there may be a recovery on a quantum meruit, and it is not necessary to base an action on the breach of the agreement. Pelton v. Smith, 50 Wash. 459, 97 P 460.

Cottrell's Est., 11 Phila. (Pa.) 93.

[b] Amount not exceeding what should have been received under will.—Where one promised to pay another by will for services rendered, but died without making a will, and the services were performed pursuant to the agreement, there could be a recovery for the value thereof, not exceeding the amount which claimant should have received by will. Hull v. Thoms, 82 Conn. 647, 74 A 825.

[c] Contrary view.—"In such case the value of the service performed, eral promise to compensate, no amount being specified, the reasonable value of the services measures the amount to be allowed.[44]

[§ 887] 5. Loans or Advances to Decedent. Money paid out for the use and benefit of decedent, with his knowledge and consent, can be recovered against the estate without showing a positive direction or a definite writing,[45] and loans and advances are sometimes allowed in equity by way of adjustment between the estate of a deceased spouse and the survivor,[46] or to other persons standing in a family relation to decedent.[47] The payment must, however, have been made under such circumstances as to impose on decedent an obligation to make repayment and establish the relation of debtor and creditor between him and the person making the payment;[48] and where children who were of age agreed that their father might use money belonging to their deceased mother with which to bury her, they were not entitled to recover any part of the amount so expended from the estate of their father.[49] Where one promises that persons taking up his notes shall be reimbursed out of his estate, the notes must be taken up during his lifetime in order to create a liability against his estate,[50] but the agreement of decedent in his lifetime, on receiving an accommodation note from plaintiff to be discounted, to pay and protect the note at maturity, is binding on his administrator.[51]

[a] Measure of recovery.—Where, in consideration of the support of his parents and the payment of debts against the father existing at the date of the agreement, plaintiff was to have the use of the father's farm and the personal property thereon, and its avails were to belong to him, and he provided for the support and care of his parents, and paid the greater portion of the father's debts, and disposed of some of the personal property, the measure of his recovery against the father's estate, where the personal property had been taken by the representatives of the estate, was the value of the property taken, less the amount of the unpaid debts. Wamsley v. Wamsley, 48 App. Div. 330, 62 NYS 954.

[b] Set-off.—Where A advanced money for his mother's support under an agreement that at her death he should be repaid from her estate, which money A procured from his wife, promising her that she should stand in his stead, it was held that equity would enforce the wife's claim against the mother's estate, but that the mother having a claim against her son and not being aware of the assignment this claim should be set off against the wife's claim. In General. The estate of a deceased guarantor or surety remains liable on the obligation after his death, and claims growing out of the same are allowable,[56] even though the contract is not, in express terms, made binding on the executors or administrators of the surety or guarantor.[57] But equity will not enforce payment out of a decedent's estate of a debt on which he was surety where it does not appear that the principal is unable to pay,[58] nor while such liability remains contingent does it constitute a claim which the obligee may prove against the estate in the probate court.[59] It has also been

It is asked, how long shall such a guaranty continue in force? and the answer is, until it be ended according to its terms." Knotts v. Butler, supra.

"A contract to pay money, although it falls due after the decease of the obligor, does survive. And what is the difference between an agreement to pay at a future period or on a future contingency? The contract is to be completed, not by any personal performance, but by the payment of money." White v. Com., 39 Pa. 167, 176.

[e] Liability of estate after administration closed.—The statute declaring bonds joint in form to be joint and several, and charging the "representatives" of a deceased surety with liability thereon, did not intend to charge the administrator and not the estate in the hands of the heirs, but the liability of the estate for breaches occurring after the death of the surety continues after the administration is closed. Allen v. Stovall, (Tex. Civ. A.) 62 SW 87 [rev on other grounds 94 Tex. 618, 63 SW 863, 64 SW 777].

[f] Stipulation prohibiting judgment against surety during principal's lifetime.—A copy or written statement of a bond payable after the death of the principal debtor, filed for the purpose of continuing the lien created by the intestate laws against the real estate of the surety after his death, will not be stricken off, notwithstanding such bond contained a stipulation that no judgment should be entered thereon against the surety during the lifetime of the principal. Stevenson v. Long, 23 Pa. Co. 391.

[g] Liability on agreement and not on account.—A, of the first part, entered into an agreement, under seal, with B as principal and C as surety of the second part, that A should furnish B with merchandise, B should sell and account to A for the proceeds, A to allow him one half of the profits for his services. C died and A filed an account in the probate court for allowance against his administrator for a balance in the hands of B under the above agreement. The claim was properly rejected, as the liability of C's administrator, if any existed, was upon the agreement and not upon the account. Willamouicz v. Strong, 8 Ark. 467.

held that, where, on the removal of an administrator, his sole bondsman is appointed administrator de bonis non, and by order of court charges himself in his account with the penalty of the bond, such penalty cannot upon his death be presented as a claim against his estate.[60]

[§ 890] b. Divisible Contracts. Where the consideration passes at different times, and the contract is therefore separate and divisible, the liability of the estate of the surety or guarantor is terminated by his death, and notice of that event,[61] but not by the death of the surety without such notice.[62]

[§ 891] c. Joint Contracts—(1) In General. In case of a joint contract of suretyship or guaranty, the estate of a deceased surety is discharged in law from liability, the survivor alone being responsible, and a court of equity will not as a general rule enforce the obligation against the representatives of the deceased obligor,[63] even though the contract is in terms made binding upon the executors and administrators of the obligors,[64] unless the contract was made joint instead of several by fraud or mistake[65] or there was a previous equity which gave the promisee a right to a several indemnity from each of the obligors, as in case of money loaned to both of them.[66] But this rule has been changed in some jurisdictions by statutes making the estate of a deceased joint debtor liable to the same extent that the debtor was liable during his lifetime.[67]

[§ 892] (2) Contribution between Cosureties. It is usually held that the liability of joint sureties for contribution is distinct from their liability to the obligee, and arises from an implied agreement among the sureties that as between themselves they will contribute ratably towards discharging any liability they may incur in consequence of becoming such sureties, and such liability is binding on the representatives of any of the sureties who may die.[68]

[§ 893] d. Indemnity to Surety. Sureties who have been compelled to pay the indebtedness of their principal have a legal demand for reimbursement, which is, of course, enforceable against the estate of the principal after his death,[69] and the fact that the surety paid the indebtedness out of the proceeds of stock given by the principal to the surety does not deprive the surety of the right to be repaid from the estate of the principal.[70]

a demand against his estate to be authenticated, allowed, classed, and paid out of the assets as other demands,[71] and where decedent made improper investments, commingled trust funds with his own so that they cannot be identified, or wasted or embezzled the trust funds in his hands, the claims of the beneficiaries whether for a partial or total satisfaction become those of ordinary creditors against decedent's estate.[72]

[§ 895] 9. Contracts of Purchase.[73] Purchase money due from a deceased purchaser upon a valid contract of sale is such a debt of decedent as the representative may rightfully pay;[74] but it has been held otherwise as to a contract of sale purely executory, under which decedent did not receive the property, where the estate of the deceased purchaser cannot complete the sale to advantage.[75]

[§ 896] 10. [d] A claim for work and labor is presumably due after the person for whom the work is performed is dead, although it is not essential that it should be due in order to constitute a valid cause of action against his estate. Lockwood v. Robbins, 125 Ind. 398, 25 NE 455.

[§ 899] 13. Debts Payable after Death. The fact that a debt or obligation contracted by decedent in his lifetime is by its terms not payable until after his death does not preclude its enforcement against his estate,[82] and a contract for payment by the promisor's executor or administrator creates a debt equally as binding as though the promise had been for payment by the promisor himself.[83]

[§ 900] 14. Contingent Claims. A debt depending upon some contingency which may never happen is not as a general rule one which may be said to be owing by decedent in such sense as to be an immediate burden on the assets or presently provable against the estate,[84] although it is otherwise, of course, where the contingency happened and the claim thus became absolute in decedent's lifetime.[85] The presentation, proof, and allowance of contingent claims are, however, matters which in many states are regulated by statute,[86] and it is frequently provided that the personal representative must retain funds for the purpose of meeting such claims when they shall accrue.[87]

[§ 901] 15. Claims Founded in Tort.[88] As torts died with the person at common law, claims founded in tort were not in earlier times considered in connection with the settlement of estates. But in modern practice, based to a very great extent upon statute, a claim growing out of a tort may survive against the tort-feasor's estate, especially if the estate has been directly or indirectly increased

[a] Provision not postponing payment indefinitely.—After the death of the maker of certain notes representing a community indebtedness, his widow made an agreement with certain of her husband's creditors, including the holders of the notes, for an extension until January 1, 1901. The agreement also provided that the parties should make certain further advancements in cash and merchandise which should be paid before payment of the old indebtedness. It was held that such provision for preferred payment did not indefinitely postpone the maturity of the old indebtedness, and was, therefore, no obstacle, after the widow's removal as survivor of the community and the appointment of an administrator, to the right of the holders of the notes to present and establish them as a claim against the maker's estate. [c] Promise to pay at or before death.—An express promise on valuable consideration to pay a certain sum at or before the death of the promisor may be enforced after his death against his estate. Woods v. Matlock, 19 Ind. A. 364, 48 NE 384.

[e] Inadequacy of consideration.—Where decedent in his lifetime wrote a letter acknowledging a debt, and directing his creditor to prove it against his estate, it was held that proof of a gross deficiency of consideration would tend to show an intent to evade the statute relative to the execution of wills, in which case the claim should be allowed for only the amount of the consideration. Calloway v. Angel, 127 N. C. 414, 37 SE 454. (2) The indorser of a negotiable promissory note containing a stipulation that "the drawers and indorsers severally waive presentment for payment, protest and notice of protest, and non-payment of this note" is liable absolutely for its payment and hence it may be presented against the estate for settlement before maturity. Dunigan v. Stevens, 122 Ill. 396, 13 NE 651, 3 AmSR 496 [rev 19 Ill. A. 310]. (3) A provision in a note, due at the maker's death, that the executor shall pay the note after payment of funeral expenses and debts, if any, does not render the note a contingent claim, but at most only shows the intention of the maker to postpone the payment of a binding obligation until his other debts are paid. but, save so far as he may have special authority over the real estate to sell or manage it, or may need it specially to sell for the payment of debts, he is not warranted in paying taxes on it assessed or levied after decedent's death, since these are charges on the land for the heirs or devisees to pay.[95] If the land is sold or partitioned under order of the court, taxes or assessments accruing subsequent thereto are not debts of decedent which it is the right or duty of the executor or administrator to pay.[96]

Inheritance or succession taxes, although ultimately chargeable against the shares of the several legatees or distributees, are ordinarily to be paid out of the estate by the personal representative.[97]

[§ 903] 17. Continuing Obligations. The policy of the law does not favor the continuance of the liability of a deceased contracting party after the time at which estates of decedents are usually administered, and it ought not to be so continued unless the terms of the instrument and the attending circumstances are such that no other result is possible.[98] But where a contract between a husband and wife pending divorce proceedings provided that the husband was to pay a monthly sum for the maintenance of a minor daughter, the payments "to continue during the minority of said child but to cease upon her earlier death," and that the agreement was to be binding as though incorporated in the divorce decree, the obligation survived the death of the husband, and constituted a continuing claim against his estate.[99]

[§ 904] 18. Discharged Claims. Where the claim against decedent has been discharged, it cannot of course be allowed.[1]

[§ 905] 19. Agreement of Representative to Pay.[2] While the personal representative may render himself personally liable to pay a claim presented against the estate, he cannot bind the estate by his express or implied promise to pay a claim which was not an obligation of the decedent in his lifetime or for which the estate is not properly and directly liable.[3] But where the consideration of a representative's contract to pay is a debt due by

[b] When charge allowable.—(1) The payment by the executor of taxes accruing on the real estate subsequent to the testator's death being for the benefit of the heirs, the court, after a long lapse of time, will presume a request, and allow it as a charge against the estate (Broome v. Van Hook, 1 Redf. Surr. (N. Y.) 444), (2) especially when such payment was not objected to at the time by any of those interested (Robertson v. Breckinbridge, (Va.) 31 SE 892). (3) So also if the heirs permit real estate to be returned delinquent for the nonpayment of taxes, and the executors pay such taxes to prevent the loss of the land, they will be entitled, as against the residuary legatees, to credit for the taxes so paid, whether or not the executors, having a naked power to sell, were under a duty to pay such taxes. decedent, the representative is not liable further than he has received assets, and if he has received no assets is not liable at all.[4]

[§ 906] 20. Claims Barred by Limitation[5]—a. In General. As a general rule a claim which was barred by the statute of limitations at the time of the debtor's death cannot properly be allowed against his estate,[6] and the personal representative is under no legal obligation to pay it;[7] but in some jurisdictions where the period required to bar the claim expires after decedent's death but before the presentment of the claim or the settlement and distribution of the estate, the claim is not barred,[8] unless it is not enforced within the prescribed time after the issuing of letters testamentary or of administration.[9]

In computing the time under the statute of limitations, when pleaded by the personal representative or heirs of decedent, the time after the granting of letters during which the personal representative cannot be sued must be deducted.[10]

If a creditor is appointed executor or administrator of the debtor's estate, the running of the statute of limitations against the representative's claim is usually held to be suspended,[11] although there is authority for the contrary view.[12]

Where a suit is abated by the death of defendant and cannot be revived against his administrator because of the insolvency of his estate, the debt is not barred by limitations as a claim against the estate if at the time the suit was brought it was not so barred.[13]

A judgment which cannot be enforced by execution, by reason of lapse of time since its rendition, may nevertheless be proved as a claim against the estate of the judgment debtor.[15]

[§ 907] b. Power of Representative to Waive Bar—(1) In General. In some jurisdictions the rule is that an executor or administrator is bound to interpose the statute of limitations when it is available to bar claims against the estate, and has no power to waive the bar,[16] unless with the consent of the persons beneficially interested in the estate.[17] But in other jurisdictions, the courts, while considering that it is, as a general rule, the duty of the representative to assert the bar of the statute where the claim was barred at the time of decedent's death,[18] has been judicially declared outlawed by a competent court,[19] or is so stale as to raise the presumption of payment,[20] he is not absolutely bound to assert the bar in all cases, but is left a certain measure of discretion, and may waive the bar where he believes the claim to be well founded and just,[21] at least where the personal estate is sufficient to pay the debt without resorting to the realty.[22] It has been said, however, that the rule allowing the personal representative to waive the bar of the statute is anomalous and ought not to be extended.[23]

[§ 908] (2) As to Representative's Own Claim.[24] In some jurisdictions the representative may waive the statute of limitations as to a claim of his own, or may exercise his right of retainer, although his claim was barred at the time of decedent's death,[25] and a fortiori, where the bar did not become effective until after decedent's death,[26] although in other jurisdictions the rule is otherwise where the claim was barred in the debtor's lifetime,[27] or at the date of the representative's qualification,[28] or before his intention to retain for the debt was made known.[29]

[§ 909] (3) Waiver by One of Several Representatives. It is generally considered that, where the personal representative has the power to take a debt of the estate out of the operation of the statute of limitations, a promise by one of several coexecutors or coadministrators may be sufficient for this purpose,[30] and likewise the statute of limi-

[d] Negligent conduct of defense.—Although the representative is not bound to plead the statute, yet if he refuses payment on the sole ground that the claim is barred, and thereby induces litigation in which he acts as his own attorney, he must exercise the same degree of diligence that would be required of him in making any other defense, especially where he stands in intimate and confidential relations to the creditors; and under such circumstances, if he so negligently conducts the defense that the creditor recovers judgment, he is not entitled to credit for the judgment, although he is forced to pay it. (2) But the claim must be established by other proof and the promise or acknowledgment cannot be relied on for the purpose of establishing the existence of the debt as against the other representative.

tations may be tolled by a part payment made by one of several representatives.[31] But there is also authority for the view that one of several representatives cannot revive a barred debt by a new promise.[32]

[§ 910] (4) Bar Accruing after Death of Decedent.[33] Where the bar of the statute had not accrued at the time of decedent's death, the executor or administrator may, according to some authorities, extend the time or waive the bar subsequently accruing,[34] especially where the delay of the claimant was at the request of the personal representative,[35] but this also has been denied.[36]

[§ 911] (5) Where Personal Representative Entitled to Entire Estate. It has been held that where the personal representative is entitled to the entire estate as sole distributee, legatee, or devisee, he has the same power to waive the statute of limitations as the debtor had in his lifetime;[37] but there is also authority for the view that where a debt against a decedent was barred by limitations, it cannot be revived by a promise to pay made by the administrator in his representative capacity, although such administrator was the sole heir,[38]

[§ 912] c. Power of Heirs or Devisees to Waive Bar. Inasmuch as the heir or devisee has no authority over the estate, he cannot, by any acknowledgment, promise, or part payment, affect the operation of the statute of limitations or the presumption of payment as to a debt of decedent, so far as the estate is concerned,[39] although he is managing the estate without letters of administration,[40] or has been appointed personal representative but has not yet qualified.[41] But so far as his own rights or property are concerned the statute of limitations is a personal defense to him, and he may of course waive it[42] or become estopped to plead it.[43]

[§ 913] d. Acts Constituting Waiver—(1) Acknowledgment of Promise to Pay—(a) In General. In many jurisdictions a representative's acknowledgment and promise to pay an indebtedness barred by the statute of limitations is not sufficient to waive the bar;[44] and it is held in some of these jurisdictions that the representative's promise to

[b] Time of appointment controlling.—(1) The representative cannot lawfully waive the bar or pay claims against which the statute of limitations had run at the time of his decedent's death or of his own qualification as representative. Woods v. Elliott, 49 Miss. 168; Byrd v. Wells, 40 Miss. 711; Trotter v. Trotter, 40 Miss. 704. 35. McCoy v. McCoy, (Ky.) 125 SW 177, 178 ("As the administrator had acknowledged the justice of the claim when it was presented to him, soon after his qualification and within six months after the death of Mrs. McCoy, and had asked the plaintiff to wait until the litigation with W. H. McCoy was decided, promising to pay the claim when he got the money, he properly refused to plead limitation in this action, when the suit was brought several years afterward. No part of the claim was barred when it was presented to him, properly proven up. The delay had been induced by him. An administrator is not required to act in bad faith. He may do what an individual may do under like circumstances, and, when the plaintiff had not brought suit at his request, it would have been an act of bad faith on his part to take advantage of the delay by pleading limitation because more than five years had elapsed when the suit was brought since some of the services were rendered. The distributees of the estate had no right to demand of him that he should act in bad faith or attempt to take advantage of the delay which he had himself caused").

36. Dern v. Olsen, 18 Ida. 358, 369, 110 P 164, LRA1915B 1016, AnnCas 1912A 1; Van Winkle v. Blackford, 33 W. Va. 573, 11 SE 26.

"It was the intention of the lawmakers to prohibit the administrator in any manner extending the bare of the statute of limitations or to interrupt its running against the debt or claim held against the estate he represents. It is claimed, however, by appellant that the insertion of the words 'which was barred by the statute of limitations at the time of the death of the decedent' expresses an intent on the part of the lawmakers to prohibit the administrator from renewing or reviving a debt already barred, but did not intend to prohibit him extending the time that the statute may run against a debt which was not barred at the death of the decedent. This statute standing alone, is subject to the construction claimed for it by appellant, when read in connection with the other provisions of the statute it seems to us that the phrase, 'at the time of the death of the decedent,' must have been added to prevent any confusion arising on account of the provisions of section 5471, whereby the time during which there is a vacancy in the administration is to be included and eliminated from the running of the statute. That time could not run prior to the death of the debtor, but necessarily runs subsequent to his death, and while the obligation on its face might show that the statute had run against the claim, still, as a matter of fact, which is subject to proof, there may have been a long period of time intervening during which there was no administrator or executor to whom the claim could be presented. This view of the statute is reinforced by the provisions of section 4078, which we have heretofore considered in this opinion. That statute provides that an acknowledgment cannot take the case out of the operation of the statute 'unless the same is contained in some writing signed by the party to be charged thereby.' Now 'the party to be charged' is the debtor, and not his legal representative. Hansen v. Towle, 19 Kan. 282. There is no personal liability against the administrator or executor for the debts of the decedent. The administrator or executor is only liable in a representative capacity, and in that capacity only to the extent of the assets of the estate. The acknowledgment of a debt or liability under this provision of the statute so as to take it out of the operation of the statute of limitation appeals to the conscience and sense of fair dealing of the debtor. After he is dead, his legal representative is purely and solely a legal representative of the estate and not of the person of the deceased. He is purely a business representative, and in no way can represent the conscience or sense of equity and justice of the deceased debtor. When the debtor dies the power and authority to waive the bar of the statute of limitations dies with him, and the conscience and sense of fair dealing to which this statute appeals thereupon loses the medium of expression and action to take the obligation out of the operation of the statute of limitations." pay before the debt becomes barred does not interrupt the running of the statute in favor of the estate,[45] but that whether the promise is made before or after the expiration of the statutory period, if it is supported by a valid consideration,[46] it binds the representative as his personal contract,[47] and precludes him from deriving any advantage from the previous lapse of time.[48] The distinction has been made, however, that, while the representative's promise will not revive a debt barred in the debtor's lifetime, if the statutory period expires after his death the promise will remove the bar[49] or interrupt the running of the statute.[50] In a number of jurisdictions, however, a representative may revive a barred debt if his acknowledgment is unqualified, amounting to an implied promise to pay,[51] or if he makes an express promise to

[a] Reason for rule.—"It seems idle to assert as a principle of law that an executor cannot bind the estate by any contract, and yet permit him by a new promise to charge the estate with a debt extinct by operation of a statute." Patterson v. Cobb, 4 Fla. 481, 487.

[c] A partial payment by an administrator on account of a claim barred by the statute in the lifetime of decedent is not sufficient to revive the claim against the estate. Hamlin v. Smith, 72 App. Div. 601, 76 NYS 258.

[d] A surrogate's decree establishing the indebtedness of an estate upon a promissory note given by decedent, and ordering a pro rata payment thereon out of the assets, does not in law amount to a promise by the representative to pay the balance of the debt so as to deprive him of the benefit of the statute of limitations. Arnold v. Downing, 11 Barb. (N. Y.) 554.

"The recognition of a debt barred by the statute by the personal representative is but a new promise, on which he must be sued personally; he is not answerable in his representative capacity for any cause of action not created by the decedent himself. If he revive the cause of action by a new promise, then the promise is essentially a new contract, which alone can be relied on to sustain the action." In re Claghorn, 181 Pa. 608, 614, 37 A 921.

[b] In Louisiana (1) where the claim of a creditor is duly presented and thereupon formally acknowledged by the representative, the latter becomes from that time the trustee of the creditor, and that prescription does not run against the claim as long as decedent's heirs allow the assets of the estate to remain in the representative's custody. pay[52] in writing.[53]

An account stated by an executor or administrator with a creditor of the estate, before the claim has been barred by lapse of time, will arrest the running of the statute of limitations with respect thereto.[54]

[§ 914] (b) Sufficiency of Acknowledgment or Promise.[55] In order that the representative's acknowledgment or promise may have any effect in saving a claim from the bar of limitations, it must be made in his representative capacity[56] and voluntarily;[57] must be made to the creditor himself or his agent, not to a third person,[58] or if made to a third person must be intended to be communicated to the creditor and to influence his conduct;[59] and must be definite and unequivocal.[60] A mere recognition of the debt is not sufficient; there must be a distinct promise to pay or such an acknowledgment as amounts to a promise.[61] An acknowledgment contained in a petition or pleading by the representative in a proceeding to which the creditor is a party may be sufficient,[62] but it is otherwise where the creditor is not a party.[63]

[§ 915] (2) Partial Payment.[64] Partial payment of a debt affected by the statute of limitations, whether the payment is made by the debtor in his lifetime or by his personal representative after his death, is regarded as a constructive acknowledgment of the debt's existence and as an act

[a] The principle is this: A slight acknowledgment of an existing debt is sufficient to take the case out of the statute, because the jury may, and ought to presume a new promise; but the acknowledgment is to be taken altogether, and if, on the whole, it is inconsistent with a new promise, no new promise shall be implied, and the statute shall bar. Scull v. Wallace, 15 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 231.

[b] Retaining assets to pay a claim, even when the act of retainer is evidenced by the record, does not amount to such a promise, admission, or acknowledgment as will waive the statutory bar. Pole v. Simmons, 49 Md. 14 [foll Washington Market Co. v. Beckley, 15 D. C. 163].

[a] Including a debt in a petition for the sale of property (1) to pay debts of the estate has been held a sufficient acknowledgment to interrupt the running of the statute. Troendle v. De Bouchel, 33 La. Ann. 753; Berens v. Boutee, 31 La. Ann. 112. (2) But the contrary has been held on the ground that the representative was compelled by law to insert the debt and thus that there could be no inference of an intention to renew or extend the liability. Everitt v. Williams, 45 N. J. L. 140.

[b] The filing of an account (1) by an executor in the orphans' court, whether under the compulsion of a citation sur petition or by a voluntary act, tolls the running of the statute as to the fund brought into court by the account in respect to claims presented before final adjudication. Ritchey's Est., 8 Pa. Super. 527, 43 WklyNC 194. (2) But where the representative in his petition for judicial settlement of his accounts named the holder of a judgment as a creditor to be cited, merely describing him as a "judgment creditor" without specifying the amount of the judgment or the date of its recovery and without stating that any sum was due thereon, there was not such a written acknowledgment of the debt as would take it out of the operation of Code Civ. Proc. § 376, which provides that a judgment shall be presumed to be paid after the expiration of twenty years unless within that time there is a payment made or an acknowledgment in writing signed by the party to be charged. [a] Order to sell lands to pay debts.—An order to sell lands to pay debts is not such an adjudication in favor of a creditor whose debt is included therein as prevents the administrator from setting up the statute of limitations in an action against him for the debt, for the creditor is not a party to the order or to the proceedings in which it is rendered; and if the proceeds of a sale of lands under such an order are impressed with a trust for the payment of debts, the administrator is not thereby estopped from resorting to the statute at law, but if relief may be had on that ground it must be sought in a court of equity. Everitt v. Williams, 45 N. J. L. 140.

from which a promise to pay the balance may be implied; in other words, the act of making part payment is treated as evidence of an intention to waive the benefit of the statute, and, like other facts in evidence, is given weight according to the attending circumstances.[65] In some jurisdictions part payment by the representative will not revive a debt which was barred in the debtor's lifetime,[66] but it is generally held that a partial payment made by the personal representative on a debt of the estate before the period of limitations has expired operates to interrupt or toll the statute as to the unpaid residue,[67] and the same rule applies with respect to the common-law presumption of payment from lapse of time.[68] In order, however, that a part payment may toll the statute, it must be such a payment as can be treated as an admission of the continued existence of the debt and as an implied promise to pay the balance.[69]

[§ 916] e. Effect of Testamentary Provisions.[70] An explicit direction in a testator's will to disregard the statute of limitations in the payment of his debts authorizes the representative to pay all just debts, although barred by limitation,[71] and a direction to the executor to pay a specified debt is clearly a recognition of the debt, and an expression of an intention that it shall be paid regardless of the statute.[72] An acknowledgment or admission contained in a will in which the debt is specifically mentioned may be sufficient to toll the statute of limitations, and it appears to be quite sufficient if in the form of a direction to the executor to pay the debt,[73] but it cannot have this effect if the instrument is not properly attested and therefore does not consitute a valid will,[74] or if the will is revoked before the creditor knows of the promise or acknowledgment.[75] But a direction to pay all "just debts" is not sufficient to waive the bar.[76] The promise or acknowledgment in the will must be unconditional, or if coupled with terms and conditions of any kind they must be fulfilled;[77] and if a legacy or devise is relied upon as an admission of a debt, the legatee or devisee, by electing to enforce his claim as creditor, waives the admission and cannot rely upon it to prevent the operation of the statute.[78]

Power may be conferred upon an executor by will which will authorize him to make an acknowledgment or promise to pay which will take a debt out of the operation of the statute.[79]

[§ 917] f. Who May Interpose Statute When Waived by Representative—(1) Creditors. As a general rule a creditor whose claim is not barred by the statute of limitations is entitled to interpose the statute against claims which are barred where the assets are insufficient to pay all in full, and the failure of the representative to interpose the statute does not affect the right of the creditor to do so.[80] Where the statute is thus interposed, the personal representative has no longer any power to bind the objecting creditor by acknowledging the debt as a subsisting claim,[81] but it has been said that a creditor's resistance of a barred claim of another creditor is effectual only when it would have been effectual if made by the representative himself.[82] The rule permitting a creditor to interpose the statute of limitations against the claim of another creditor applies where claimant is the personal representative.[83]

The individual creditors of a sole heir who is also administrator may plead the statute of limitations against debts of decedent and as against such creditors the administrator cannot by any promise revive the barred debts.[84]

[§ 918] (2) Legatees and Distributees. Where the representative has a discretion as to interposing the statute of limitations,[85] it is clear on principle that his failure or refusal to plead the statute should be binding on those entitled to the personal estate as legatees or next of kin and should preclude them from taking advantage of the statute, and it has been so held,[86] although the rule has not always been strictly adhered to,[87] and has been considered not applicable where the claim was that of the representative himself.[88] Where the representative cannot waive the statute,[89] his failure to interpose it does not bind the legatees or next of kin and the statute may be pleaded by them,[90] especially against a claim of the representative himself.[91]

[§ 919] (3) Heirs and Devisees. An heir or devisee may interpose the statute of limitations against a claim sought to be enforced against the real estate descended or devised,[92] and, since the personal representative has no power or control over the real estate, his failure to interpose the statute of limitations to a creditor's claim can have no effect to subject the real estate to the creditor's demand and cannot prevent the heir or devisee from invoking the statute.[93] So also the

[a] Reason for rule.—"It is settled that this defence as well as other legal defences may be set up by one interested creditor against the claims of another, as the representative might himself do, since their rejection will enlarge the pro rata shares of such debts as are allowed. . . . This right of the creditor to oppose the claim preferred by another, grows out of his relations to the cause as a plaintiff with adversary interests in this respect against his associate plaintiffs, since in a separate action against the personal representative, he is not bound to interpose the statute to defeat a just claim." Oates v. Lilly, 84 N. C. 643, 644.

[b] Confession of judgment on barred claim. — The representative may confess a judgment on a debt barred by the statute of limitations even though the estate is insolvent. This does not constitute a fraud in law upon the creditors, and unless fraud or collusion is alleged the creditors have no standing to ask that the judgment be opened so that they may interpose the statute. [a] The right to interpose the statute as a technical plea against a creditor's claim in proceedings in the orphans' court is vested solely in the personal representative, although the court may consider the fact of the bar in connection with other evidence in determining the justice of the claim; but no decision of the orphans' court will divest the jurisdiction of a court of law over the same subject matter. representative's acknowledgment of the debt or his promise to pay it does not bind the real estate belonging to the heirs or devisees or affect their right to plead the statute,[94] and the same is true of a part payment[95] or a payment of interest[96] by the representative, although the rule appears to be otherwise where there is a devise to the executor in trust to pay debts.[97]

Judgment against representative. It is generally held that where a creditor of the estate recovers judgment against the representative and payment of the judgment is claimed from the real estate, or where the personal representative has paid the judgment and claims reimbursement from land, the heir or devisee may protect his interests by showing that the debt on which the judgment is founded was barred at the time of its rendition,[98] although there is also authority for the view that this cannot be done unless fraud or collusion is shown.[99]

Where the personal representative, as a creditor, seeks to enforce against the land or the proceeds thereof a claim barred in the lifetime of decedent, the statute of limitations may be interposed by the heirs and devisees,[1] and as against them the representative cannot revive the claim.[2]

[§ 920] (4) State Holding by Escheat. Where land has escheated to the state, neither the failure of the representative to plead the statute of limitations nor his acknowledgment of the debt affects the right of the state to interpose the statute.[3]

[§ 921] (5) Estoppel to Plead Statute.[4] Where legatees or distributees induce a creditor to delay enforcement of his claim until it becomes barred by the statute of limitations, they are estopped by their conduct from pleading the statute;[5] and it has been held that where they stand by without making inquiry into the affairs of the estate or offering any objection and permit the personal rep-

"The statute of limitations had perfected a bar as to all these debts, before the grant of letters testamentary to the appellant. It is not now in his power to remove it, or by any act, admission, or promise, to revive these debts, so that they would be chargeable on the lands, divesting the possession of the devisee, or of his alienees, and incumbering the estate with their payment." resentative to pay a debt barred by the statute, they are bound by his payment and cannot object to his being credited therewith.[6] The heirs also may by their conduct be estopped to plead the statute.[7] But the fact that heirs, legatees, or distributees may have become estopped to set up the statute does not preclude a creditor from pleading it in protection of his own claim,[8] or if the barred debt has been paid a creditor may object to the allowance to the representative of credit in his accounts for the payment so made.[9]

[§ 922] 21. Claims Arising after Death of Decedent[10]—a. In General. As a general rule claims arising after decedent's death are not allowable directly against the estate,[11] although in many cases where the representative has rendered himself personally liable on such claim, if the claim properly arose out of some matter connected with the administration, he is allowed, after paying the same, to reimburse himself from the assets.[12] There are, however, to be found in the reports a number of cases in which the rule stated above has been departed from.[13]

"Funeral expenses are an obligaiton created by law against the estate of a decedent." Nashville Trust Co. v. Carr, (Tenn. Ch. A.) 62 SW 204, 205.

"They are liabilities or charges against his estate, raised up and imposed by law, as distinguished from obligations arising by some act or promise of the decedent. They stand in the same category as the expenses of administration. An administrator is a trustee for the payment of funeral expenses, because they are impositions of the law, precisely and for the like reasons that he is a trustee for the persons who are entitled to the distributive shares of an estate by virtue of the statute of descents, or for creditors of the estate proper." Hildebrand v. Kinney, 172 Ind. 447, 451, 87 NE 832, 19 AnnCas 788 [rev (Ind. A.) 83 NE 379].

[a] Reason for rule.—"The presumption is that funeral expenses are incurred on the credit of the estate of the deceased." Rice v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 195 Mass. 507, 81 NE 285.

[b] The representative is liable on an implied promise to persons furnishing a funeral suitable to the degree of decedent, although this is done by direction of a third person. Sullivan v. Horner, 41 N. J. Eq. 299, 7 A 411; Matter of Moran, 75 Misc. 90, 134 NYS 968; Sinnott's Est., 15 Pa. Dist. 873, 33 Pa. Co. 391; Tugwell v. Heyman, 3 Campb. 298; Rogers v. Price, 3 Y. & J. 28, 148 Reprint 1080.

[c] Decedent's estate, and not his widow is liable for the expenses of his funeral. Compton v. Lancaster, (Ky.) 114 SW 260.

[d] A widow may order the interment for her deceased husband on a scale in proportion to deceased's financial condition, for which the estate will be liable. Wagoner Undertaking Co. v. Jones, 134 Mo. A. 101, 114 SW 1049.

[e] Funeral expenses incurred before appointment of representative.—Under the statute an administrator is bound to pay, out of the assets in his hands, the funeral expenses, including the purchase of a burial lot, at the request of the widow and next of kin, although such expenses are incurred before his appointment. Sweeney v. Muldoon, 139 Mass. 304, 31 NE 720, 52 AmR 708.

[f] Assent of administrator before appointment.—The assent of a person to the correctness of the funeral expenses ordered by another renders him liable therefor as administrator when he subsequently takes out administration. Lucy v. Walrond, 3 Bing. N. Cas. 841, 32 ECL 386, 132 Reprint 634.

[g] Obligation of mere custodian of decedent's property.—While it is the duty of an executor or administrator to provide for the burial of his testator or intestate, if not already done by others, no such duty rests on the custodian of deceased's personal property, and hence where a married woman dies leaving personal property which passes into her husband's possession, and the latter dies without paying the wife's funeral expenses, no personal liability attaches to one subsequently coming into possession of such property as administrator of the husband. Romig v. Sheldon, 124 NYS 26 [aff 142 App. Div. 925, 127 NYS 1141].

[a] Funeral ordered by husband.—The funeral expenses of a married woman, although ordered by her husband, are enforceable against her estate. Nashville Trust Co. v. Carr, (Tenn. Ch. A.) 62 SW 204.

[b] Where the husband is insolvent, the estate of a deceased wife is liable for her funeral expenses. Scott's Est., 15 Pa. Co. 316.

[c] Effect of judgment against husband.—A married woman's estate is not relieved from liability for her funeral expenses by the fact that judgment has been recovered therefor against her husband. Johnson's Pet., 15 R. I. 438, 8 A 248.

[d] Where a husband acting as personal representative of his deceased wife (1) pays her funeral expenses, he is entitled to credit therefor in his accounts. McCue v. Garvey, 14 Hun (N. Y.) 562; Matter of Very, 24 Misc. 139, 53 NYS 389, 28 NYCivProc 163. Express promise by executor. The estate is not, however, liable on an express promise by the executor to pay for funeral expenses where one would not be implied by law, or upon one different from that which would be implied.[20]

[§ 925] (2) Reliance on Credit of Third Person. Where the undertaker or other person furnishing work or accessaries for the funeral or burial has done so upon the order and credit of a third person, he should look immediately to such person for payment.[21]

[§ 926] (3) Reimbursement from Estate. Where the representative or a third person has rendered himself liable for the funeral expenses and has been compelled to pay them, or has defrayed such expenses in an emergency and under proper circumstances, he is entitled to reimbursement from the estate so far as the expenditures were reasonable and proper.[22] This rule has been held to permit a husband to be reimbursed from the estate of his deceased wife for her funeral expenses which he paid,[23] notwithstanding his common-law obligation to see to her proper interment;[24] but there is also authority for the view that the husband is not entitled to reimbursement where he was financially able to bury his wife in a suitable manner;[25] and the right of reimbursement is denied where this would operate to the detriment of creditors of the wife.[26]

[§ 927] (4) Items and Amount of Expenditure.[27] The funeral expenses include not only the solemnization of the interment, but also the ceremonies and accompaniments attending the same.[28]

Tenn.—Steger v. Frizzell, 2 Tenn.

What shall be the reasonable expenses of funeral or burial for reimbursement from the estate, and what items may be properly included in such a charge, must depend largely upon the station in life of decedent and his family, and the condition of his estate; and justice to creditors as well as to the surviving family demands that there shall be no extravagant outlay to their loss.[29]

Special circumstances may justify an expenditure unusually great in one or more particulars,[30] as where one dies far from his home or his proper burial place and transportation of the body becomes necessary and proper,[31] or where kindred and friends are summoned from a distance to attend the funeral or accompany the remains from a distant point.[32] But the fact that decedent expressed a wish to be buried in an expensive coffin does not authorize an expenditure for a coffin not suited to the pecuniary condition of the estate.[33]

[§ 928] (5) Funeral Expenses of Decedent's Wife and Family. The funeral expenses of the decedent's wife and family are sometimes made, by statute, a charge upon his estate,[34] and they have been held to be payable out of his estate even in the absence of an express statutory provision where decedent and his wife and children perished in a common disaster.[35]

[§ 929] d. Tombstones and Monuments.[36] The expense of erecting a tombstone or monument at the grave of decedent is usually allowed against the estate,[37] especially where the estate is

[a] Items of expenditure.—(1) A suit of clothes for burial seems a proper item for allowance (Steger v. Frizzell, 2 Tenn. Ch. 369), and (2) flowers (O'Reilly v. Kelly, 22 R. I. 151, 46 A 681, 84 AmSR 833, 50 LRA 483. Contra Matter of Schroeder, 113 App. Div. 204, 99 NYS 176 [aff 186 N. McWhorter, 44 Miss. 124). (4) But it is otherwise as to dinners furnished to persons attending the funeral or feed for their horses. Shaeffer v. Shaeffer, 54 Md. 679, 39 AmR 406; Santee's Est., 9 Kulp (Pa.) 142. (5) Expenditures for a wake, made at the request of the widow of decedent who left no children, being reasonable, are recoverable of the executors as expenses of the funeral, they being proper in character. McCullough v. McCready, 52 Misc. 542, 102 NYS 633 [aff 122 App. Div. 888 mem, 106 NYS 1135 mem]. (6) So the expense of a banquet at a wake, consisting of cheese, crackers, and tobacco, has been held a proper item of funeral expenses. Johnson's Est., 8 Pa. Co. 1. (7) Charges for mere kindly offices or for use of one's house for funeral services, if by a relative, are looked upon with disfavor. Hewett v. Bronson, 5 Daly (N. Y.) 1; McHugh's Est., 152 Pa. 442, 25 A 875. (8) In an early case where the estate was insolvent, no expenses were allowed except for coffin, ringing of the bell, and the fees of the clerk and bearers. Shelly's Case, 1 Salk. 296, 91 Reprint 262. (9) The expense of a post-mortem examination is not chargeable against the estate as a part of the funeral expenses. Smith v. McLaughlin, 77 Ill. 596. (10) But a charge for disinterment and reburial has been allowed. Allen v. Allen, 3 Dem. Surr. (N. Y.) 524.

[b] Mourning apparel.—(1) Out of regard to particular circumstances or a decedent's last directions, an allowance from the estate has sometimes been made for items not strictly within the rules of funeral charges, such as a moderate outlay for the mourning apparel of the widow and children. [a] Where the estate is insolvent and there are minor children, no more should be allowed than is necessary for decent Christian burial. Gorman's Est., 2 Kulp (Pa.) 61.

[b] Repudiation of expensive casket.—Where an undertaker procured and placed a dead body in a casket more expensive than the wife desired, and she immediately repudiated his action, and caused the body to be buried by other undertakers in another casket, the expensive casket being stored by such other undertakers, the first undertaker was not entitled to recover from the estate the price of the casket furnished by him. Wright v. Harned, (Tex. Civ. A.) 163 SW 685.

[c] Decedent's manner of living not controlling.—Where one died, in Texas, possessed of a poor estate and leaving a widow in miserable financial condition, a funeral in New York, involving expensive transportation charges and a new casket purchased on the arrival of the remains in New York, were not matters of such necessity as to imply a promise of the widow, as administratrix, to pay for them, and the extravagance of the decedent's manner of living should not be considered as authorizing a heavier expense for his burial. It was not intended that any person might erect a tombstone to the deceased and charge the administrator with the cost of it, as a debt or a preferred debt against the estate. The necessity for a decent burial arises immediately upon the decease, and the law pledges the credit of the estate for the payment of such reasonable sums of money as are expended for that purpose; but there is no similar necessity for the erection of a tombstone, and, if a tombstone is erected without the authority of the administrator, the statutes have not made the cost of erecting it a debt of the estate").

[b] Services rendered after death pursuant to previous employment.—Where an attorney was retained in a suit, and after the client's death he performed legal services in the same suit for the administrator, a claim presented to the administrator for fees in the suit, without going into details, must be considered as a claim against the estate for services rendered to the deceased during his lifetime. Stark v. Hart, 22 Tex. Civ. A. 543, 55 SW 378.

[c] Defense of action by cosurety of decedent.—Where the surviving cosurety on a bond has defended an action brought to collect it after decedent's death and thereby saved several hundred dollars, the estate of decedent is liable to him for one half of the counsel fees and costs incurred in such defense. Connolly v. Dolan, 22 R. I. 60, 46 A 36, 84 AmSR 816.

[d] Litigation by creditor on behalf of estate.—One of the creditors of an estate who in good faith maintains necessary litigation to save the property and secure its proper application is entitled to have the fees of his attorney paid from the estate. In re Weed, 163 Pa. 600, 30 A 278.

[e] Allowance of representative's commission to person performing services.—On a bill brought to enforce against an administratrix an agreement to give the complainant certain of the real estate of her intestate, in consideration that he would effect a compromise of certain claims against the estate, it was held that he might reasonably be allowed, as damages for nonperformance, besides his advances and interest, the commission of ten per cent for extra trouble in collecting the debts which the law would have allowed the administratrix. Shepherd v. Hammond, 3 W. Va. 484.

[f] Fees of auctioneer at void sale.—Where an auctionneer sold property at the request of the curator of a vacant estate, and it turned out that the estate was not vacant and the sale was therefore void for want of legal authority of the curator to sell, the auctioneer had no claim against the estate for his fees as auctioneer. Navarro's Succ., 24 La. Ann. 105.

[g] Failure of representative to object.—Where administrators, although cognizant of the services rendered by certain attorneys, interposed no objection, and it was expected that the estate should pay for such services as were directly beneficial to it, the attorneys were entitled to an allowance therefor, although the administrators had never employed them in such a manner as to be personally bound for such services. Marx v. McMorran, 136 Mich. 406, 99 NW 396.

[h] Services not beneficial to estate.—Where an attorney voluntarily gave advice and information to a prospective administrator in his individual capacity, who was thereby put on inquiry as to the existence of assets, which were discovered by the administrator through information obtained wholly from other sources because of the attorney's refusal to give such information, the attorney was not entitled to compensation as one who had rendered services beneficial to the estate, and his claim therefor could not be allowed. [b] Claim of attorney employed by administrator who has neglected his duties.—The failure of an administrator, authorized to employ an attorney, to perform his duties as administrator does not prevent an attorney employed by him, and rendering services for the estate, from having a valid claim against the estate for fees, although such claim is also a personal claim against the administrator. Knight v. Hamaker, 40 Or. 424, 67 P 107.

[c] Discretion of court.—On an application by an attorney for compensation for services other than in ordinary probate proceedings, the probate court has the same discretion as in allowing to the administrator attorney's fees paid by him, and it should deny the application, although not opposed, if the services should not be paid for out of the estate. [a] Judgment against representative returned unsatisfied.—Where an execution on a judgment against an administratrix for legal services is returned unsatisfied, and the administratrix is insolvent, a judgment may be recovered against her in her representative capacity, to be paid from the funds of the estate. Saror has removed from the jurisdiction,[53] or the claim is for the care of live stock.[54] In order to justify such an allowance, however, the services must have been performed for the estate itself; claims for services for the widow, heirs, or other parties in interest cannot be so allowed,[55] and a fortiori, it is proper to refuse an allowance for managing an estate to one who acted for a corporation wrongfully in charge of the estate.[56] It is also necessary that the services should have been performed either at the request of decedent made before his death or at the instance of some person having some authority, or at least some apparent authority, to act for decedent or his estate,[57] and compensation has been refused for services rendered as a mere volunteer pending the appointment of an administrator.[58] So also a devisee doing work on an unfinished house pending administration, in order to protect the property, has been held not entitled to recover from the estate therefor.[59] The person performing the services must have done so in the expectation of being compensated therefor, and one who at the time of performing the services intended them to be gratuitous cannot thereafter obtain compensation therefor against the estate.[60] The allowance must be a reasonable one, taking into consideration the amount of the estate, the value of the services, and the time and trouble which their performance entailed,[61] and the amount rests largely in the discre-

[b] Insolvency of successor.—The statute requiring only that the administrator who made the contract or incurred the liability shall be insolvent, it was not necessary, in an action against the successor of the administratrix contracting for the services, and others, to allege that the successor and the other defendants were insolvent. [a] Illustration.—Testator sold his land to his son, taking notes. He left his estate to his wife for life, with remainder to his children. The widow purchased other land, giving notes therefor, and subsequently assigning the son's notes as collateral security, and on suit on both sets of notes the widow and son employed claimant as attorney, and after adverse judgment and before sale he filed a suit for the settlement of the estate, and compelled the former plaintiff to seek her relief in this suit. Claimant also filed a claim against the estate in favor of the son's wife. It was held that, in allowing claimant's fees as attorney for the executors, he was not entitled to compensation for the services rendered the widow and the son and his wife. Clarke v. [e] Contest over administration.—In a contest for the administration of a succession the attorney of the defeated applicant has no claim for his services against the succession, but in a case where the defeated applicant is named as an alternate executor in the will of the deceased, his attorney will be entitled to a reasonable compensation from the succession for such of his services as were beneficial to the estate, such as procuring an inventory and the appointment of an attorney of absent heirs and the like. Florance's Succ., 36 La. Ann. 304.

[f] Where allowance made to suspended administrator for services.—Where, on settling the account of an administrator who had been suspended, the court allowed him a certain sum for the services of a certain attorney, such attorney cannot recover such sum from the successor of such administrator or from the estate, but he must look for pay to his employer. McKee v. Soher, 138 Cal. 367, 71 P 438, 649.

[g] Attorney's fees of infant who is a necessary party to suits involving estate.—Where an infant who has no property except his prospective interest in a decedent's estate is a necessary party to suits for construction of the will and involving the estate, none of which are commenced by him or on his behalf, expenses for an attorney, incurred by his guardian ad litem, will be allowed out of the estate as part of the expenses of settlement. Ford v. Ford, 88 Wis. 122, 59 NW 464.

[h] Incidental benefit to estate.—Where attorneys representing half the claims against intestate's estate devoted much time to investigating its condition, and applied for removal of the administrator, but induced him to resign without compensation, and the widow and heirs of deceased waived their exemptions, these arrangements benefiting the estate in the sum of sixteen thousand dollars, it was held that they, not having acted otherwise than under the employment by their clients, were not entitled to an allowance for services to the estate. [a] In determining what is a reasonable attorney's fee for services rendered in the settlement of a decedent's estate, the court should consider not only the amount of the estate and the character of the services rendered, but also the fact that part of the services were not properly chargeable to the estate, but to devisees or claimants. Clarke v. Garri-

tion of the court.[62] A claim against an estate for services of an attorney, employed by the special administrator in a contest over decedent's will, should be disallowed, where the parties stipulated for a discontinuance of the suit and disallowance of one will and for the probating of the other without costs to either party.[63]

[§ 932] g. Loans or Advances to Estate. While advances to an estate are not commonly recoverable by action at law against the executor or administrator,[64] the equity and probate rule favors the reimbursement of loans or advances made suitably and in good faith by the representative, the surviving spouse, kindred, distributees, or creditors for the immediate benefit of the estate.[65] But an allowance to reimburse an annuitant under the will son, 79 SW 240, 25 KyL 1999.

[b] Character of services the main consideration.—"While an attorney should have a more liberal allowance made him for his services in advising the personal representative in the settlement of a large estate than he should where less money is involved, his fee should, in the main, be regulated by the character of the services he renders the estate. If this service is valuable, his compensation should be liberal. If it is not valuable, and yet competent and good his compensation should be fair. No fixed rule can be adopted by which a scale of fees for attorneys can be laid down. All that can be said is that they must be reasonable, taking into consideration the character of services rendered, the time employed, the size of the estate, and the extent of the litigation." Harding v. Harding, 132 Ky. 133, 154, 116 SW 305, 311.

[c] The court should also consider the fact that part of the services were not properly chargeable to the estate, but to devisees or claimants. Clarke v. Garrison, 79 SW 240, 25 KyL 1999.

[d] Allowance held reasonable.—An allowance of eighteen hundred dollars to a lawyer for services requiring a trip to Europe to attend to the transportation of the body of a deceased person from Europe is not excessive, where the services involved the loss of fifty-five days from professional duties, and although not strictly professional, were undertaken on a telegram from deceased's wife, from which claimant, who was her legal adviser, might infer that she needed legal advice. In re Parry, 188 Pa. 38, 41 A 384, 68 AmSR 850.

[e] Attorney's fees held reasonable.—(1) Where an administrator was sued on two notes, one for fifteen thousand dollars and the other for twenty-one thousand pounds English money, and defeated the action as to the latter note, the allowance to his attorneys of a fee of twenty-five hundred dollars will not be disturbed on appeal, there being uncontradicted evidence that the fee is reasonable and customary. Newcomb v. Newcomb, 60 SW 642, 22 KyL 1359 (holding further that the fact that in litigation then pending the bulk of the estate was afterward adjudged to plaintiff in such action as executrix under a foreign probate of a will of decedent, and that there would have been no occasion for her action if she had waited until the termination of that litigation, did not affect the amount of compensation to which the attorneys for the administrator were entitled for defending that action). (2) A fee of one thousand dollars for two attorneys who served the executor of an estate worth over eighty thousand dollars is not excessive, although the executor was relieved of his trust by heirs represented by other attorneys. Cahill v. Bianki, 134 La. 617, 64 S 488.

[f] Attorney's fees held unreasonable.—(1) An allowance of seven thousand five hundred dollars to an attorney for defending a suit for fraud brought against the executors of an estate amounting to about two hundred thousand dollars and for prosecuting a suit for the construction of the will, and defending a suit involving back taxes, and advising the executors as to the disposition of the estate, is unreasonable and should be reduced to three thousand five hundred dollars. Baldwin v. Barber, 148 Ky. 370, 146 SW 1124. (2) An allowance of twelve hundred dollars to attorneys representing an estate is excessive, where it appeared that their services were largely rendered in promoting the individual interests of heirs. Bickel v. Bickel, 79 SW 215, 25 KyL 1945.

"While it is not within the power of an executor or administrator by advances made by him to the estate to thereby make the estate his debtor regardless of the character or quality of his claim, yet it is equally well settled that such advances, made suitably and in good faith for the benefit of the estate, may be allowed and recovered as claims against the estate." In re Williams, 47 Mont. 325, 330, 331, 132 P 421 [cit Cyc].

"It is no argument to say that a claim for advances should not be allowed, since the administrator would be placed in the situation of passing upon his own claim. Section 7542, Revised Codes, specifically recognizes the fact that an executor or administrator may be a creditor of an estate, and provides the method of allowing such a claim." In re Williams, supra.

[a] This rule has been applied (1) to a payment of debts by the widow (Gilliam v. Gilliam, 146 Ky. 15, 141 SW 370), (2) before the appointment of an administrator (Jenks v. Terrell, 73 Ala. 238). (3) A creditor may pay taxes to protect his interest and be reimbursed out of the proceeds of a foreclosure sale. Whittaker v. Wright, 35 Ark. 511. (4) Debts of a testator, paid in good faith by his executrix and residuary life legatee, are properly allowed against his estate, although the legatee took possession of the estate without proving the will. Ver Duin v. Ver Duin, 42 N. J. Eq. 325, 5 A 647. (5) Where a deceased wife's will expressly directs the payment of funeral expenses from her estate, the husband is entitled to reimbursement for such expenses. In re Skillman, 146 Iowa 601, 125 NW 343, 140 AmSR 295. (6) Where testator bequeathed his estate to his wife, with directions to support and educate the children until they were of age, and provided that after her death the property should be divided among his children, and letters of administration were granted to the widow and testator's brother, and after the widow's death the brother continued the maintenance of the minor children as one family for two years, until the appointment of a general guardian and in so doing expended his own money, equity could allow him to be reimbursed, he having done what on application the court would have directed him to do. Brandon v. Brandon, 4 Thomps. & C. 385, 50 HowPr 328 [aff 66 N. Y. 401]. (7) A claim of testator's daughter for repairs to the real estate and other expenses incurred by the testator and paid by the daughter out of her earnings was properly allowed, but money advanced to pay household expenses was not a proper charge, where the evidence shows that it was voluntarily contributed. Matter of Meuschke, 61 Misc. 9, 114 NYS 722.

[b] Money credited to decedent by mistake and drawn by representative.—An administrator de bonis non is liable to a banker for money credited by mistake to the intestate in his lifetime, and drawn by and paid to the original administrator in the belief that it belonged to the estate. Baring v. Putnam, 2 F. Cas. No. 984, 1 Holmes 261.

[c] Representative stands as assignee of original creditors.—An executor can be allowed for debts of the estate paid by him out of his own means only as assignee of such debts in place of the original creditors. Vulte v. Martin, 44 HowPr (N. Y.) 18.

[d] Dower in mortgaged land.—The fact that the widow of one who had given a mortgage upon realty took dower in the land does not entitle the mortgagee, in a distribution of the assets of the estate of the deceased husband, to be treated as having "contributed" anything toward the payment of its liabilities. Bellerby v. Thomas, 105 Ga. 477, 30 SE 425.

[e] Loan to pay debt barred by limitations.—A note executed by an executor for money borrowed to pay a debt of testator's which was barred by limitations is not a charge against the estate, but is binding against the executor and the beneficiaries under the will who authorized the executor for debts of the testator paid from the annuity is erroneous where there is no proof that any money from which the annuity could have been paid has been applied to the payment of testator's debts.[66]

Interest may and should be allowed to an executor or administrator who advances money for the benefit of the estate under proper circumstances.[67]

Advances for benefit of beneficiaries. A claim for reimbursement out of the estate cannot be successfully urged by one whose advances were made for the individual benefit of those entitled to share in the estate, and not for the benefit of the estate itself.[68]

[§ 933] h. Expenses of Administration.[69] The legitimate expenses of administration are to be met out of the assets of the estate,[70] but the proper mode of doing this is for the representative to make the necessary disbursements, for which he will be allowed credit in his accounts, rather than by allowing such expenses as a direct charge against the estate,[71] as the expenses of administration are not usually considered debts of decedent.[72] A statute limiting the lien of debts of decedent against his real estate does not run against claims of executors for compensation due them, for such a claim is not a debt of decedent but a part of the expenses of administration.[73]

Administration expenses have been held to include the expenses of probating the will[74] or defending to make such loan. Hamlin v. Smith, 72 App. Div. 601, 76 NYS 258.

[a] When rule not applicable.—Where an attorney employed by executors in a will contest executed a release to them, providing that he would make no further personal claim against them for his services, but that any further claim should be made against the estate, such provision could not be treated as surplusage, on the theory that the attorney, having been employed by the executors prior to the probate of the will, could have maintained no claim against the estate, the rule that executors are personally liable on their contracts, although made for the benefit of the estate, and that ordinarily such contracts are not enforceable directly against the estate being neither absolute nor unqualified. [b] The expenses of resisting an appeal from a decree admitting the will to probate are administration expenses. Hazard v. Engs, 14 R. I. 5.

[c] Claim against realty.—A claim for the expenses of having a will probated is not a liability against the real estate, except where the land has to be sold for payment of debts. Taylor v. Crook, 136 Ala. 354, 34 S 905, 96 AmSR 26.

[d] No allowance for expenses connected with a pending contest.—Credit will not be allowed a representative for expenditures made in connection with a contest over a will which is still pending, as liability against an action for revocation of probate,[75] the expenses of litigation in behalf of the estate,[76] the compensation of the personal representative,[77] and an estate duty taxable under the laws of the country where decedent was domiciled.[78] Attorney's fees for services rendered to the representative in connection with the performance of his duties are expenses of administration and payable out of the assets,[79] and expenses incurred by the executor in carrying out the provisions of the will stand upon the same footing as expenses of administration.[80]

Expenses of administration have been held not to include the costs of a suit in which plaintiff, whose rights as heir, although recognized, were held extinguished, failed to take anything,[81] the costs of an unsuccessful plaintiff in a suit to obtain revocation of the probate of a will,[82] the expenses of an heir, incurred after an administrator was appointed, in hunting up other heirs or next of kin,[83] the cost of recording deeds to the administrator,[84] the expense of a sale of decedent's land by a stranger, although made under color of an order of the probate court,[85] the expenses attending an unsuccessful effort to establish a paper as the will of decedent,[86] or the premium on an executor's bond on sale of realty.[87] Payments in the adjustment of conflicting claims to an estate by those asserting title thereto cannot be construed as debts, or treated as expenses in settlement of the estate.[88] An heir who, as such, successfully prosecutes an action for removal of the executors, is not entitled to payment out of the estate of his expenditures in the removal, although he afterward becomes special administrator.[89] If a husband's curtesy estate in the property of his deceased wife gives him possession to the exclusion of the administrator, the expenses of fencing the property, insurance on a building thereon, and other expenses for the benefit of the husband, are not chargeable against the estate.[90] Expenses incurred in taking testimony on a contest of a will are not expenses of the administration of an estate by a temporary administrator which it is proper for him to pay from the funds of the estate.[91] The cost of raising a fund, including counsel fees, auctioneer's charges, commissions, etc., fall upon the fund, and are not chargeable as "costs of administration."[92] Where a testator gave his widow the income of all his property for life for her benefit and support, but provided that out of the income she should pay all necessary repairs on the buildings and all taxes, besides insurance, and the executors were empowered to pay all debts, it was held that, the executors having under a power from the wife collected the income from the property, the estate was not chargeable with the expense of collecting it, or with repairs, taxes, and insurance.[93] An administrator should not be allowed the expense of procuring evidence for use in an action against the estate,[94] especially where he is himself a lawyer and has been allowed the fees of attorneys in the action, and the testimony collected was never used.[95]

"The law recognizes that an administrator may assume the attitude of a mere creditor against the estate without forfeiting his office or right to compensation." Goodman v. Griffith, 155 Mo. A. 574, 581, 134 SW 1051.

[a] Care of decedent and wife.—It was proper to allow an executor's claim against the estate for nursing and caring for the testator and his wife up to the time of their death, where the services were reasonably worth the sum charged. Dockins v. Vass, (Ky.) 124 SW 290.

[b] Claim for services may be allowed.—Edelen v. Edelen, 11 Md. 415 (the personal services of a widow and administratrix after the death of her husband, in nursing his slaves and furnishing them with necessaries, are a proper subject for a claim against the estate); Evarts v. Nason, 11 Vt. 122 (the time spent and the expenses incurred by an executor in procuring an injunction against a judgment obtained through the fraud of his coexecutor and a third person against the estate, without his knowledge, may be allowed to him in his account); Rix v. Smith, 8 Vt. 365 (it is not a sufficient objection to allowance to an administrator for services that they were for the purpose of realizing a balance supposed to be due to himself).

[c] Services as attorney.—Where a will directed that testator's executor might act as attorney for the estate and make charge therefor, and the executor furnished services, assigned his claim, and the assignor brought suit against the executor and his coexecutor on the claim, it was held that the action not being a case where action must first be brought against the executors and they in turn reimburse themselves out of the estate, and not imposing a personal liability on the coexecutor, the action would not lie, but the proper practice would be to present the claim for allowance against the estate. Jacobsen v. Levine, 59 Misc. 449, 110 NYS 1002.

[d] Where the issuance of trust certificates was necessary in connection with the disposition of part of the property of a testator who was possessed of a large estate, a trust company, which was one of the executors, was properly allowed payment for its services in acting as trustee for the holders of such certificates, such services being independent of its duties as executor. Moore's Est., 13 Pa. Dist. 137.

[e] Indebtedness to estate.—It is not a valid objection to a charge in an executor's account for expenses of sickness and burial of testator's wife during his lifetime that the executor was at the time he paid such expenses indebted to the estate. Titlow's Est., 11 Pa. Co. 625.

[f] Proof of claim to procure order to sell realty.—Where an estate is not fully settled, and the administrator has exhausted the personal assets in the payment of debts not his claims require the approval of the probate court,[1] or a suitable person must be appointed to represent the estate with respect thereto.[2] Such a claim must, however, be established by legal evidence in the same manner as that of any other claimant,[3] and the representative must show that the demand is a valid[4] and existing[5] one. Such claims should be closely examined and scrutinized,[6] and, of course, rejected where they appear to be illegal or unjust.[7] Where a decedent agreed to convey to a person who afterward became his executor a city lot of a certain value as a compensation for services rendered, and died after the services were rendered, but before conveying the lot, it was held that the value of the lot was to be regarded as the measure of compensation, so that the executor was entitled to be allowed a claim for the value of the lot against the estate, and was not required to present the claim for the reasonable value of his services.[8]

The fact that the representative treats a fund as assets of the estate does not prevent him from claiming a share in that fund as his own by reason of a demand against the estate.[9]

Conveyance of property pursuant to contract of decedent. Under statutes providing in substance that, when the vendor in a contract to convey land dies before conveyance, the court may authorize the executor or administrator to convey the land on presentation of a verified petition by the purchaser, an executor or administrator has the same right as an outside party to file a petition for, and obtain, a conveyance of property which the decedent contracted during his lifetime to convey to him, and need not first resign his position as executor or administrator, in order to have his claim enforced against the estate.[10]

Legacy to executor in payment; proof of will. Where a testator leaves to his executor, who is a creditor, a less amount than is due in payment of the debt, and the executor proves the will, he cannot claim more than the amount so given to him.[11]

Laches may bar the assertion of a claim of the representative.[12]

[§ 936] 23. Purchase of Claims against Estate. An executor or administrator is not allowed to make a profit by purchasing claims against the estate for less than their face value and then procuring an allowance for the full amount, but he is entitled to credit for only the amount actually expended in the purchase of such claim,[13] and the same rule own, he may prove a claim due to him personally, preparatory to obtaining an order to sell the real estate. Johnson v. Gillett, 52 Ill. 358.

[g] Failure of representative to collect note on which decedent surety.—Where an administrator owns a note upon which the intestate is surety, and willfully omits to collect it when he can, and the principal afterward becomes insolvent, the estate is discharged. Jones v. Graham, 36 Ark. 383.

[h] Credit on notes of representative held by others.—A debt owing an executor by the estate cannot be paid by giving the executor credit on notes against him individually, held by strangers or by the heirs. Honeywell's Est., 10 Kulp (Pa.) 164.

[d] Services to decedent.—An executor is not entitled to compensation for services rendered his testator during the latter's life, where the services were mutually beneficial, and no evidence is given that any compensation was expected or intended, and the charge was not made until after the account was filed and exceptions thereto had been taken. applies where the purchase is made before the appointment as administrator but in contemplation thereof.[14] But a third person who purchases claims against the estate becomes a creditor of the estate[15] and is entitled to receive the full amount of his claim, or in case of insolvency his percentage on the full amount, regardless of what he paid for it;[16] and the personal representative cannot be held liable for the difference.[17]

[§ 937] B. Presentation and Allowance[18]—1. Necessity for Presentation—a. In General. In most of the states there are express statutory provisions, commonly termed statutes of nonclaim, to the effect that claims against the estate of a decedent shall be exhibited or presented to the personal representative or to the probate court,[19] usually

[a] Reason for rule.—"The plaintiff acquired this claim as a trustee while such trustee, and it is repugnant to all sense of justice and equity that he now get over four times what he paid on the same." Bidwell v. Smith, supra.

[b] This rule is very stringent and applies even where the purchase was made by borrowing money at a high rate of interest and by the sale of the administrator's individual property, although the estate was thereby saved from insolvency. Trimble v. James, 40 Ark. 393.

[c] The transferee of a judgment against a succession, who holds it by virtue of a transfer made by the agent of the heirs and administrator of the estate who acquired the judgment by compromise with the creditor, can recover from the succession only the amount which the agent and administrator paid the judgment creditor. Draughon v. Quillen, 23 La. Ann. 237.

[d] Transaction presumed to be a payment.—(1) It being the duty of the representative to discharge claims instead of purchasing them on his own account, it will generally be presumed that where he pays a creditor and takes the latter's securities the transaction is a payment of the claim and not a purchase thereof. Johnson v. Blackman, 11 Conn. 342. (2) Therefore the securities in the representative's hands will be deemed extinguished and he can be allowed only the sum paid for them. Borst v. Bovee, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 219 (the indorsers on the creditor's note were discharged and that evidence as to the insolvency of the estate was not admissible); Gillett v. Gillett, 9 Wis. 194.

[e] Claims which may be purchased.—An executor has a right to purchase claims against his testator for moneys received by testator as a guardian and agent, where none of the funds received by the testator in such manner ever came into the hands of the executor, and there is no fraud or concealment on his part. Murray v. Barden, 132 N. C. 136, 43 SE 600.

[f] Claim presented to representative.—Where a creditor of an intestate gave to the administratrix a receipted bill for his debt, stating that he intended to present the amount thereof to the administratrix, and not to discharge the estate, the administratrix could charge the estate with the amount of the receipt. Buxton v. Barrett, 14 R. I. 40.

[g] Settlement of claims at discount.—If an administrator pays a dividend of an insolvent estate to a bank in its depreciated currency, or otherwise settles claims against the estate for less than the amount due, he is not entitled to the benefit of the amount thus saved, but it will belong to the estate. Anderson v. Duke, 28 Miss. 87; Dahlgren v. Peale, 24 Miss. 142.

15. Moffatt v. Loughridge, 51 Miss. 211; Veldman v. Lindeman, 7 Oh. Dec. (Reprint) 676, 4 CincLBul 911; Swensen v. Walker, 3 Tex. 93.

[a] A person who lent money to an administratrix to save the estate from forced sale and to whom the claims paid off with such money were transferred can recover thereon from the estate. Veldman v. Lindeman, 7 Oh. Dec. (Reprint) 676, 4 CincLBul 911.

[b] Effect of authority from administrator.—An administrator may bind himself but cannot bind the estate by authorizing a person to buy up claims against the estate, and one who incurs expense by purchasing such claims at the instance of the administrator must look to him and not to the estate for reimbursement unless they are established as valid subsisting claims against the estate in the manner prescribed by law. Johnson v. Brown, 25 Tex. Suppl. 120 [dist Swenson v. Walker, 3 Tex. 93].

[c] When representative precluded from contesting claim.—Where a person has purchased a claim against the estate upon the faith of its allowance and approval by the probate judge, and the assurance of the administrator that it will be paid, the administrator is precluded from contesting its original justice or that it is binding on the estate. Swenson v. Walker, 3 Tex. 93.

[a] This rule has been applied to: (1) A surety on the bond of the representative. Halsted v. Hyman, 3 Bradf. Surr. (N. Y.) 426; Luther v. Hunter, 7 N. D. 544, 75 NW 916. (2) One who was named as executor but renounced. In re Ralston, 158 Pa. 645, 28 A 139.

[b] Anyone except the executor may lawfully buy claims at a discount, and collect their full value. Owen v. Potter, 115 Mich. 556, 73 NW 977.

[c] Applying assigned claims to purchase price of property.—Where the testator's widow and her two brothers formed a partnership to buy at a discount claims against the estate, which was generally believed to be insolvent, and to apply them at their full value to the purchase of property belonging to the estate, an order of the probate court permitting them to be so applied to the amount of forty per cent of the purchase price, which the parties did, thereby acquiring the bulk of the property of the estate at a large profit to themselves, it was held that these transactions were not fraudulent as to legatees and creditors whose claims remained unsatisfied. Owen v. Potter, 115 Mich. 556, 73 NW 977.

[d] Where a stranger and an administrator unite in the purchase at a discount of a debt due from the intestate, they stand in the same relation that the administrator would occupy if he alone had made the purchase, and can recover of the estate no more than they paid for the debt. Mitchum v. Mitchum, 3 Dana (Ky.) 260.

Right of debtor to set off claims purchased at a discount in action by representative see infra § 1876.

17. Owen v. Potter, 115 Mich. 556, 73 NW 977 (this is true even though the assignor of the claim, being a corporation in which the executor was a stockholder, would have sold it to the estate at the same discount allowed to the claimant, and the executor is not culpable in sharing as a stockholder in the proceeds of the sale by the corporation).

within a specified time after the death of the debtor, the appointment of an executor or administrator of his estate, or the publication of a notice calling for claims.[20] The provisions of some of these statutes make is necessary for the creditor not only to exhibit his claim to the personal representative within the statutory period, but also to present it to the probate court for allowance[21] or to file it in the court having probate jurisdiction;[22] but statutes requiring such filing have been held to be directory only, on the ground that presentation to the personal representative is of itself sufficient to prevent the claim from being barred.[23] Under some statutes it is required that the creditor shall not only present but prove his claim within a limited period, presentation alone not being sufficient to prevent the statutory bar;[24] while under others nothing more than formal, ex parte proof is required at the time of presentation.[25] By some statutes it is provided that no claim shall be a charge against, or a lien upon, the estate, unless presented or filed within a certain time,[26] while under others, the effect of nonpresentation within the statutory time is merely to postpone the claimant to those creditors who have duly presented their claims,[27] or to release the representative from liability to the creditor for payment of debts, legacies, and distributive shares before the claim is presented, and to confine the creditor to such assets as remain undistributed or, in the absence thereof, to remit him

[a] "The object of the law in fixing a definite period within which claims must be presented is to insure the speedy settlement of the affairs of a deceased person and the early delivery of the property of the estate into the hands of the persons entitled to receive it. As we said in the case of McMicking v. Conpieng (21 Philippine 211), 'it is the policy of every people which maintains the principle of private ownership of property that he who owns a thing shall not be deprived of its possession or use except for the most urgent and imperative reasons and then only so long as is necessary to make the rights which underlie these reasons effective;' and, 'it is a principle of universal acceptance which declares that one has the instant right to occupy that which he owns, and it is only in the presence of reasons of the strongest and most urgent nature that that principle is prevented from accomplishing the purpose which underlies it.' It is distinctly against the interests of justice and in direct opposition to the policy of the law to extend unduly the time within which estates should be administered and thereby keep the property from the possession and use of those who are entitled to it." In re De Dios, 24 Philippine 573, 576.

[b] Statute strictly construed.— A statute which bars claims against an estate if not presented within the prescribed time, is to be strictly construed, and its operation is not to be extended beyond the letter of the statute as construed by the courts. Wickes v. Walden, 161 Ill. A. 3.

[c] The fact that the personal representative includes the claim in a report made to the court as a foundation for a proceeding to sell land to pay debts does not relieve the creditor from the necessity of complying with a statute requiring that claims be exhibited to the court. Roberts v. Flatt, 142 Ill. 485, 32 NE 484 [aff 42 Ill. A. 608].

[d] An administratrix ad colligendum is not such a representative of the estate as to require a presentation of a claim against the estate within eighteen months after the grant of letters to her. Erwin v. Mobile Branch Bank, 14 Ala. 307.

to his remedy against the heirs, devisees, legatees, and distributees to whom assets have come.[28] Where statutes of the latter character are found, it has been held that the claim may be filed and an accounting demanded at any time before the final discharge of the representative,[29] unless the circumstances are such that the creditor is estopped by his delay.[30] The statutes of nonclaim are in some states considered as statutes of limitation,[31] but in others they are considered merely as special acts designed for the purpose of facilitating the speedy settlement of decedents' estates.[32] It has also been held that a statutory provision that the failure of a holder of a note to present it for allowance against the deceased principal's estate within two years after the granting of letters testamentary or of administration will release the surety enters into and forms a part of the contract, and is not merely a statute of limitation.[33] These statutes are not usually given a retroactive effect.[34] There can be no judicial determination that there are no claims against an estate until the expiration of the statutory time for filing claims.[35]

If a valid presentation of a claim has once been made, a change in the administration by the appointment of another representative does not necessitate a second presentation.[36] So also, where a claim has been duly presented by a creditor and is afterward assigned, presentation by the assignee is unnecessary,[37] and, where a creditor has duly presented or filed his claim, a surety who pays the debt stands in the place of the creditor as to the steps already taken to enforce the claim and is subrogated to the creditor's rights to prosecute the claim to allowance and payment.[38] Where a claim has been originally presented or filed in time, a mere substitution of parties, made necessary by a decision of the supreme court, after the expiration of the time limited for presentation, does not make the claim a new one so as to be barred because not presented within the required period.[39]

Even independent of statute a failure to present and prove a claim within a reasonable time may amount to waiver of the same,[40] or through long failure to present the claim or to take any steps to enforce it the creditor may be barred by laches.[41]

Effect of foreign statute. Where decedent left property within the state, the claim of a resident of the state, so far as such property is concerned, is not affected by a statute of another state, where administration is had, barring claims for nonpresentation.[42]

[§ 938] b. Effect of Representative's Knowledge of Existence of Debt. The more general view is that knowledge on the part of an executor or administrator of the existence of a debt or claim against the estate is not sufficient to dispense with the necessity of presentation,[43] although a contrary view is asserted in some jurisdictions.[44] It has been held, however, that, where the same person is personal representative of both the debtor and the creditor, a formal presentation of the claim is unnecessary;[45] and in a case where the executor was also president of a corporation which held a note given by decedent, it was held that his knowledge and possession of the note as president of the corporation were equivalent to knowledge and possession thereon as executor, and hence dispensed with presentation.[46] So, also, where the administrator agreed with a mortgagee that, if he would waive his mortgage and permit the property to be sold, his note would be first paid, it was held that the mortgagee need not file a formal claim.[47] It has also been held that the effect of payment by the representative of interest on a mortgage may be to dispense with or raise a presumption of presentation.[48]

[§ 939] c. Effect of Suit on Claim—(1) In General. Although there is some authority to the contrary,[49] the weight of authority supports the view that the commencement of a suit and its continuous prosecution operates as a presentation of a claim or obviates the necessity of presentation,[50] even though claimant does not succeed in his action.[51] But this result is not produced where plaintiff voluntarily submits to a nonsuit,[52] or where the proceedings instituted are voluntarily abandoned

[a] Reason for rule.—"The plain and obvious design of the statute was, to enable distributees, and legatees, to demand a distribution of the estate, at the expiration of eighteen months from the grant of letters, unless it was necessary for the executor, or administrator, to retain it longer in his hands, for the purpose of paying debts. To justify him in so doing, he must be furnished with the evidence that claims exist against the estate, and will be enforced. This evidence the statute requires, to be a presentment of the claim, and in our opinion, nothing short of an actual presentment will satisfy its demand." Jones v. Lightfoot, 10 Ala. 17, 24.

Gewe v. Hanszen, 85 Mo. A. 136. (2) So also a judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction against a personal representative in an action brought within two years from the grant of letters will be as binding as if the claim had been presented and allowed in the county court. Roberts v. Flatt, 142 Ill. 485, 32 NE 484 [aff 42 Ill. A. 608]; Darling v. McDonald, 101 Ill. 370. (2) But this provision does not apply to proceedings in the district court for the establishment of the claim; the statute contemplates claims pending on the law or equity side of the district court, and not those pending within its probate jurisdiction. by him,[53] or vacated for irregularity,[54] and are not renewed. It has also been held that presentation is not dispensed with by reason of the bringing of an action against the representative in a court which has not jurisdiction thereof;[55] that the filing of a petition to be allowed to intervene in a suit against the administrator is not a sufficient presentation of a claim to the administrator where the petition for intervention is denied,[56] and that the taking of a default judgment against the representative, which is subsequently vacated for insufficiency of the service of summons, is not a presentation of the claim.[57] Neither is an action against the representative in his personal capacity an effective substitute for presentation of the claim.[58]

[§ 940] (2) Claims in Suit at Decedent's Death. The mere pendency of a suit against decedent at his death is not a presentation or exhibition of the claim within the meaning of the statute of nonclaim, nor does it dispense with the necessity of presentation,[59] unless the statute so provides.[60] But where plaintiff within the time limited for the presentation of claims obtains an order of revivor or making the administrator a party to such suit, this order is generally equivalent to, and dispenses with, the actual presentation of the claim,[61] unless of course the statute requires a presentation of the claim under such circumstances.[62] There must, however, be a revivor within the period limited by statute for presentation in order to prevent the claim becoming barred,[63] and of course the action must have been on the specific claim, and not for another purpose.[64] If plaintiff suffers a nonsuit after such revivor and institutes a new suit within a year, it is not necessary to exhibit the claim again to the administrator.[65]

[§ 941] d. Effect of Insolvency of Estate. In the absence of special statutory provisions the ordinary statutes of nonclaim requiring presentation of claims within a certain period are applicable, although the estate is declared insolvent.[66]

[b] Reversal on appeal of representative.—Where a judgment rendered against a decedent in his lifetime is reversed on an appeal taken by the administratrix as substituted defendant, the judgment creditor cannot recover from the administratrix if he has failed to present his claim against the estate, as the action is deemed to be pending until its final determination on appeal unless the judgment is sooner satisfied, and the judgment cannot be considered satisfied by an execution issued and levy made before decedent's death and a sale thereunder after the appeal was taken. [§ 942] e. Effect of Testamentary Provisions. A mere formal direction in a will that all the testator's just debts shall be paid does not obviate the necessity of presenting and proving claims within the statutory period;[67] but it is usually considered that if the will empowers and directs the executor as to the sale of property, the payment of debts and legacies, and the management of the estate, and especially if it confers upon him a power to sell, or vests in him an express trust for the purpose of paying debts, etc., or directs that the estate be managed and settled without the intervention of the court, the claims of creditors need not be presented,[68] although to impose a trust on the land so as to produce this effect the intention of the testator must be clear, certain, and free from ambiguity.[69]

[§ 943] 2. What Claims Should Be Presented—a. In General. As a general rule all claims against decedent should be presented for allowance,[70] and as used in the statutes under discussion the word "claims" is held to include such debts or demands as existed against decedent in his lifetime and might have been enforced against him by personal actions for the recovery of money,[71] or, as it has been expressed, every species of liability which the

[b] Will creating express trust for payment of debts.—By item 1 of his will, testator directed that all of his just debts be paid "as soon as can be done without injury to my estate." By item 2 he directed that one hundred dollars and an annuity during the life of a servant be paid to her. By item 5 he gave to his wife all of his personal property during her natural life, with power to sell and dispose of it as she might see fit, "but in such event the proceeds are to be placed in the corpus of my estate subject to the provisions hereinafter specified." By item 6 he directed the sale of encumbered property in another state "as soon as can be done without too great loss," with discretion to lease or sell at public or private sale, and finally authorizing the extension of the payments due on the property, or the renewal or execution of other judicious loans and mortgages to pay the encumbrance. By item 7 the executors were given full power to carry on and cultivate testator's plantations, or to lease or sell any and all real or personal property of testator in the state of his domicile, "which may be deemed necessary or expedient to pay my debts," providing that certain pieces of real estate be held to the last. By item 8 he directed that his wife claim no allowance, and charge no commissions for services against his estate, but that she be allowed a reasonable amount for the support of herself, family, and household, to be charged in her account against testator's estate, to be decided by her own judgment. By item 9, "subject to the foregoing articles," testator gave the entire control of his estate to his executors, and to his wife the entire use and income, rents and profits for life, with power to dispose of one fourth of his estate remaining at her death, by last will and testament, in default of which the one fourth was to remain part of his estate. By item 10, "subject to the life estate" of his wife, testator disposed of the remainder of his estate. It was held that the will created an express trust for the payment of debts. Gordon v. personal representative can be called on to pay out of the general funds of the estate.[72] Debts or demands not falling within this category need not as a general rule be presented.[73] The rule requiring presentation applies to claims of corporations,[74] or nonresident creditors,[75] and to claims contracted out of as well as within the state.[76] Where a claim is satisfied by a division of a fund in the claimant's hands and a retention of his portion, he need not present his claim.[77]

Among claims which should be presented may be mentioned claims founded on contract generally,[78] a claim arising out of a contract of guaranty[79] or indemnity,[80] a claim arising during decedent's lifetime under a bond to which he was a party,[81] a claim for damages for breach of contract or covenant,[82] a claim arising out of a partnership,[83] a claim founded on a devastavit committed by an executor or administrator since deceased,[84] a claim founded on services to decedent,[85] a claim for wages,[86] a claim for board furnished to decedent,[87] a claim by a surety who has paid his principal's debt for reimbursement from his estate,[88] a claim of a principal debtor against the estate of a person sued as his trustee in "trustee process,"[89] a claim of a tenant in common for rents collected by a deceased cotenant,[90] a claim against the estate of a deceased life tenant for dissipating the goods in which he had only the life estate,[91] a sheriff's claim for money advanced to decedent for taxes,[92] a claim in favor of a wife for money lent to her deceased husband,[93] a money claim against a deceased wife in favor of the administrator of her husband, who predeceased her,[94] an unpaid allowance to decedent's wife for separate maintenance or alimony,[95] and claims of heirs based on the appropriation of community property by one member of the community after the death of the other.[96] Where a wife was induced to sign a satisfaction of a judgment for alimony while of unsound mind, and she continued of unsound mind until her death, which occurred after the death of the husband, it was necessary to file the judgment as a claim against decedent's estate in order to recover the alimony awarded.[97] The claims of heirs against an administrator for exoneration from a mortgage made by decedent have been held barred where not presented before the rule to bar creditors was made absolute.[98]

It has been held not necessary to present purely equitable claims,[99] the claim of a guardian for compensation or for services and expenses,[1] a claim arising out of an agreement by decedent to make a will in claimant's favor,[2] the claim of an administrator's attorney for fees,[3] a claim on a mortgage given to secure the debt of a third person,[4] a claim of a life insurance company for credit on the policy for the amount of an unpaid premium note,[5] a claim arising under a contract between the claimant and decedent's widow, while she was acting as independent executrix,[6] a claim based upon the statutory liability of a stockholder in a national bank,[7] a claim against decedent for misappropriation of funds as guardian,[8] claims for legacies or distributive shares[9] or the widow's award out of the personal property of the estate,[10] a claim by an heir to an extra allowance on distribution of the estate by virtue of an agreement with the other heirs,[11] or claims of title or for possession or recovery of property.[12] A right acquired by garnishment against a decedent, being a mere liability and not a "claim," need not be registered.[13] Where, in a foreclosure against the devisee and heirs of a deceased purchaser of mortgaged premises personally liable for the debt, it appears from devisee's cross petition that the executor, who is also residuary legatee, has received personalty exceeding the mortgage, such executor may be compelled to discharge it, and the right to enforce payment is not barred by failure of the mortgagee to file a claim against the deceased purchaser's estate for payment of the mortgage.[14]

13. Harris v. Hutcheson, 65 Miss. 9, 3 S 34.

14. Schade v. Connor, 84 Nebr. 51, 120 NW 1012.

Where it appeared in a proceeding by an administrator to collect assets that an agent of decedent was to be allowed a commission for selling property, it was proper to allow the retention of such commission wihout forcing the agent to probate his claim.[15]

[§ 944] b. Public Debts—(1) Debts Due to United States. The statutes of the several states in regard to the presentation of claims have as a rule no application to claims due the United States, either as a bar to the claims or as affecting their enforcement in the federal courts.[16] But it has been held that where the United States is compelled to come into a state court to enforce its rights, it must come in as any other suitor;[17] and where the presentation of the claim to the executor or administrator is a prerequisite to the right to sue thereon, the United States must comply with such requirement.[18]

[§ 945] (2) Debts Due to State, County, Etc.—(a) In General. It is usually considered that a claim due to a state must be presented,[19] although this has been denied,[20] and it is sometimes expressly required by statute that debts due to the state be paid without presentation to the probate court for allowance.[21] A claim for a debt due to a county must be presented.[22]

[§ 946] (b) Taxes and Assessments. The more general view is that the requirement of presentation does not apply to claims for taxes and assessments, whether assessed before or after the death of decedent,[23] although there is also support for the view that a presentation of such a claim is necessary.[24]

Claim for reimbursement for taxes paid. A mortgagee who has paid taxes, as provided for in a mortgage made by decedent, after presentation of the claim founded on the note and mortgage, may be allowed reimbursement on foreclosure without presentation of his claim,[25] but where a purchaser, to whom decedent in his lifetime conveyed land by warranty deed, has been compelled to pay taxes which were a lien on the property at the time of the conveyance, his claim for reimbursement must be presented.[26]

[§ 947] c. Contingent Claims—(1) What Claims Are Contingent. Within the meaning of the statutes relating to presentation of claims against a decedent's estate, a contingent claim is one under which the existence of any right or liability is not presently certain or absolute but is dependent upon some future event which may or may not happen; if the right or liability exists independent of the event, the claim is absolute, notwithstanding until the happening of the event it may be uncertain in amount or unenforceable.[27]

"The exclusive jurisdiction given to the Probate Court, in the settlement of decedent's estates, cannot affect the claims of the Government, however it may bear on private claims. The mode of proceeding in the Probate Court, and the time given for the settlement of accounts, cannot regulate the claims of the government, nor affect the remedies given to it under its own laws. The demand in this case has been adjusted by the accounting department, under the laws of Congress, and there can be no obligation to present the account for adjustment, to the Probate Court of Michigan. Such a rule of procedure would subject the action of the Federal Government to the regulation of a state Government." U. S. v. Backus, supra.

[a] Reason of rule. — "Ample power is given to assess against the executors, and they are bound to pay the taxes and reimburse themselves out of the estate in their hands. No reason appears why a different rule should apply in regard to omitted property and other property belonging to the estate, and in each case, under our statutes, the assessment is against the executors. As we have seen, the tax is a debt against the owner, the person assessed is liable for the tax, but has a remedy against the beneficial owner and a lien on the property, and can reimburse himself out of the property in his possession." Pratt v. Northam, 11 F. Cas. No. 11,376, 5 Mason 95; Page v. Bartlett, 101 Ala. 193, 13 S 768; Taylor v. Robinson, 69 Ala. 269; McDowell v. Jones, 58 Ala. 25; Owens v. Corbitt, 57 Ala. 92; Foster v. Holland, 56 Ala. 474; Fretwell v. McLemore, 52 Ala. 124; Hooper v. Bryant, 3 Yerg. (Tenn.) 1. But compare Atherton v. Fullam, 55 Vt. 388 (the liability of a surety on an administration bond did not become "absolute," nor had the claim against the surety "accrued," until after the final judgment against the administrator settling his account). (6) On the death of a ward the liability of the surety on the guardian's bond becomes an "accrued" claim. Glass v. Woolf, 82 Ala. 281, 3 S 11.

[c] The liability of an indorser of a promissory note (1) is contingent until maturity, demand, and notice of dishonor, and where the indorser dies before the maturity of the note, the statute of nonclaim does not run until the liability becomes absolute, and the fact that the indorser without the knowledge of the indorsee was indemnified by the maker so that demand and notice were waived cannot have the effect to set the statute of nonclaim in operation before the note matures. Cockrill v. Hobson, 16 Ala. 391. To same effect Meriden Steam Mill Lumber Co. v. Guy, 40 Conn. 163; Dunnigan v. Stevens, 19 Ill. A. 310 [rev on other grounds 122 Ill. 396, 13 NE 651, 3 AmSR 496]. (2) When, however, the indorser has waived presentment, his liability is absolute, instead of contingent. Dunnigan v. Stevens, 122 Ill. 396, 13 NE 651, 3 AmSR 496.

[d] Claim of indorser against maker's estate.—Where an unmatured negotiable note is indorsed by the payee and held by the indorsee, and after the probate court fixes the time for presenting claims against the deceased maker's estate the indorser is compelled to pay the note, he then becomes a creditor and is entitled to present his claim within the statutory period thereafter. Meriden Steam Mill Lumber Co. v. Guy, 40 Conn. 163.

[f] A claim payable on a third person's death is an absolute and unconditional claim payable in the future, only the time of payment being uncertain. It is an accrued claim when created, payment being postponed merely until the death occurs. Farris v. Stoutz, 78 Ala. 130; McDaniel v. Putnam, 100 Kan. 550, 164 P 1167, LRA1917E 1100; Tenney v. Lasley, 80 Mo. 664 (such a claim is contingent); Brown v. Dunn, 75 Vt. 264, 55 A 364.

[g] Claim dependent upon a person reaching a certain age.—A covenant to convey land upon a certain person reaching a certain age is contingent until the person reaches the specified age. Pinkston v. Huie, 9 Ala. 252.

[h] Claim dependent upon action of court.—(1) In some states it is held that a claim dependent upon the action of a court in granting or refusing relief is not a contingent claim; that if the claimant is not entitled to a judgment or decree he has no claim, but that if he is entitled his claim cannot be regarded as contingent on whether its enforcement by suit will be granted or refused. Jones v. Lightfoot, 10 Ala. 17 (demand dependent upon correction of mistake in a deed); Jorgenson v. Larson, 85 Minn. 134, 88 NW 439. (2) But in other states claims depending for their validity upon the action of a court are deemed contingent. Backus v. Cleaveland, Kirby (Conn.) 36; Sankey v. Cook, 82 Iowa 125, 47 NW 1077; Senat v. Findley, 51 Iowa 20, 50 NW 575.

[i] Warranty of title.—A claim for damages for breach of such a warranty is contingent until the property has been recovered from the buyer by a person holding a paramount title. Payson v. Hadduck, 19 F. Cas. No. 10,862, 8 Biss. 293; Walker v. Byers, 14 Ark. 246; Dugger v. Oglesby, 99 Ill. 405; Blair v. Allen, 55 Ind. 409; Hall v. Martin, 46 N. H. 337; Caplinger v. Vaden, 5 Humphr. (Tenn.) 629.

[j] Liability on a replevin bond is contingent until the determination of the replevin action. Suppiger v. Gruaz, 137 Ill. 216, 27 NE 22.

[l] Assumption of mortgage.—(1) A claim by the mortgagee against the purchaser on his assumption of a mortgage on the land conveyed is contingent until foreclosure of the mortgage. Terhune v. White, 34 N. J. Eq. 98 [foll Field v. Thistle, 58 N. J. Eq. 339, 43 A 1072 (aff 60 N. J. Eq. 444, 46 A 1099)]. To same effect Stichter v. Cox, 52 Nebr. 532, 72 NW 848. (2) Where the purchaser executes a bond to the mortgagee to pay the mortgage assumed, no claim for a deficiency can be made unless the claim is presented. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Howell, 32 N. J. Eq. 146.

[m] Deceased partner's liability.—When the liability of the estate of a deceased partner for partnership indebtedness is dependent on the insolvency of the surviving partner, a claim therefor as against the estate is contingent during the solvency of the surviving partner. Pendleton v. Phelps, 19 F. Cas. No. 10,923, 4 Day (Conn.) 476.

[n] The claim of a surviving partner against the estate of a deceased partner for contribution has been held contingent until the business of the firm is settled. Logan v. Dixon, 73 Wis. 533, 41 NW 713.

[o] Note not due.—(1) An absolute liability on a note payable at a future day is not a contingent claim and must be presented within the time limited for presenting existing claims. Austin v. Saveland, 77 Wis. 108, 45 NW 955. (2) Unmatured claims generally see infra § 949.

[p] Lease providing for payment of taxes and insurance; claim of colessee for contribution.—When a lease requires the lessees to pay taxes assessed on the property and to keep the property insured, a claim by one of the lessees against the estate of his colessee for contribution for insurance premiums paid after the death of the colessee and for payment of taxes assessed after his death is contingent. Oswald v. Pillsbury, 61 Minn. 520, 63 NW 1072.

[q] Stockholders' liability (1) for the debts of the corporation to the extent of the unpaid subscription is contingent until the assets of the corporation are distributed, being dependent upon the insolvency of the corporation. Rankin v. Big Rapids, 133 Fed. 670, 66 CCA 568; Mortimer v. Potter, 213 Ill. 178, 72 NE 817 (stockholder of national bank); Wickham v. Hull, 102 Iowa 469, 71 NW 352; National German-American Bank v. Tapley, 56 Minn. 420, 57 NW 1065; Hospes v. Northwestern Mfg., etc., Co., 48 Minn. 174, 50 NW 1117, 31 AmSR 637, 15 LRA 470; Robinett v. Starling, 72 Miss. 652, 18 S 421; Garesche v. Lewis, 15 Mo. A. 565 [aff 93 Mo. 197, 6 SW 54]; Hazlett v. Blakely, 70 Nebr. 613, 97 NW 808; In re Macdonald, 29 Wash. 422, 69 P 1111; South Milwaukee Co. v. Murphy, 112 Wis. 614, 88 NW 583, 58 LRA 82. (2) But when the liability is absolute, the fact that the amount thereof has not been determined in an action against the stockholder does not on the revival after his death of the action against his administrator render the claim a contingent one, not presentable until its amount is determined. Denver First Nat. Bank v. Hotchkiss, 49 Colo. 593, 114 P 310. (3) So an assessment of a stockholder's liability by a court against stock held by a decedent's estate, accruing within the time limited for presenting claims against the estate, but not presented during that time, is barred. Bidwell v. Beckwith, 86 Conn. 462, 85 A 682.

[r] Contingent fee.—A claim for attorney fees which were contingent upon recovery is a contingent claim. Burton v. Lockert, 9 Ark. 411; Morgan v. Gibson, 42 Mo. A. 234.

[s] Breach of contract of sale of realty.—Where a landowner enters into an agreement for the sale of his

[§ 948] (2) Necessity for Presentation.[28] Under some statutes it is not necessary to present contingent claims, but they may be enforced whenever the liability becomes fixed by the happening of the contingency, even though this occurs after the time limited for presentation.[29] But this rule is often limited either by the express provisions of the statutes or by the decisions, so that the requirement of the statute does not apply while the claim remains contingent, but begins to run upon the happening of the contingency which fixes the liability, or at the time when the claim accrues, even though this date is after the expiration of the general period limited for presenting claims,[30] land, in which the wife does not join, damages for breach upon his death cease to be contingent upon the absolute refusal of the widow to convey as to her statutory third therein. Jorgensen v. Larson, 85 Minn. 134, 88 NW 439.

[t] Absolute guaranty.—Liability on the absolute guaranty of the debt of another is not contingent so as to excuse the failure to present. National Guarantee L. & T. Co. v. Fly, 29 Tex. Civ. A. 533, 69 SW 231.

[u] A claim for rent to accrue under a lease to terminate upon destruction of the leased premises is contingent. Mackin v. Haven, 187 Ill. 480, 58 NE 448 [aff 88 Ill. A. 434].

[v] Covenant against encumbrances.—A claim for damages for breach of a covenant against encumbrances is contingent prior to a substantial breach. Whittern v. Krick, 31 Ind. A. 577, 68 NE 694.

[w] Enforcement of claim dependent on reformation of instrument.—The fact that the enforcement of the claim is dependent on the reformation of a deed does not render it contingent. Jones v. Lightfoot, 10 Ala. 17.

[x] The fact that there are conditions to be performed by the claimant (1) before he can enforce the claim will not render it contingent. Painter v. Smith, 2 Root (Conn.) 142. (2) Accordingly, a note the payment of which is contingent upon the performance of some act on the part of the payee must nevertheless be presented like any other claim against an estate, although it is not due at the time that the final settlement of the estate is made. Cincinnati, etc., R. Co. v. Heaston, 43 Ind. 172. (3) So also a claim for damages for breach of a contract to convey land becomes absolute on payment of the purchase price, and does not remain contingent until a demand for a conveyance. The distinction is made between an "accrued claim" and the accrual of the cause of action. King v. Mosely, 5 Ala. 610.

[y] Claim founded on executor's breach of duty.—(1) The claim which the creditor of an estate may have against the executor, by reason of his acts or omissions as executor, is one which becomes fixed in the lifetime of the executor, and is not contingent on the fact that the estate may prove insolvent on an account taken after the death of the executor, and in the event of his death such claim must be presented for allowance to the administrator of his estate within the time fixed in the notice to creditors. In re Halleck, 49 Cal. 111 [aff Myr. Prob. 46]. (2) The personal liability of an administrator to creditors of the estate after settlement of his account and order by the probate court for payment of creditors becomes absolute, and the claims of creditors against him personally are no longer contingent. Sargent v. Kimball, 37 Vt. 320.

[z] Claims for indemnity (1) are contingent until the person entitled to be indemnified has been damaged. Stone v. Clarke, 40 Ill. 411; Bullard v. Moor, 158 Mass. 418, 33 NE 928; Harding v. Smith, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 478; Jones v. Carrollton Bank, 71 Miss. 1023, 16 S 344. (2) So the claim of a sheriff against the estate of his deputy for a default of his deputy is contingent until the sheriff has been charged or has answered for the same. Neil v. Cunningham, 2 Port. (Ala.) 171.

[a] Unauthorized investment by guardian.—Where a guardian invested funds of her ward in a note and mortgage without authority of court, the statute limiting the time of filing claims against the estate did not apply to the filing of a claim for the amount of such mortgage with the executor of such guardian, since such claim was contingent on the acceptance of the investment by the ward on coming of age, and also because the ward was not a creditor of the estate until coming of age. [a] Formerly in Connecticut (1) there was no limitation of the time for presenting contingent claims, but they might be presented at any time after they accrued (Pendleton v. Phelps, 19 F. Cas. No. 10,923, Brunn. Col. Cas. 95, 4 Day (Conn.) 476; Bacon v. Thorp, 27 Conn. 251 [expl Griswold v. Bigelow, 6 Conn. 258; Booth v. Starr, 5 Day (Conn.) 419]; Backus v. Cleaveland, Kirby (Conn.) 36), (2) even though they accrued after settlement and distribution of the estate (Griswold v. Bigelow, supra).

[b] Accrual of claim and accrual of right of action.—(1) In some states the meaning of these statutory provisions concerning contingent claims is not that a claim must be presented within a certain period after the right of action has accrued, but that it must be presented within that period after the claim itself has accrued. A claim may fall within the operation of the statute and thus require presentation, although the right of action thereon has not accrued; it is enough that a definite right to demand in the future exists. Glass v. Woolf, 82 Ala. 281, 3 S 11; McDowell v. Jones, 58 Ala. 25; Jones v. Lightfoot, 10 Ala. 17; King v. Mosely, 5 Ala. 610; Austin v. Saveland, 77 Wis. 108, 45 NW 955. (2) But in other states the period for presentation begins when the right of action accrues. Gay's App., 61 Conn. 445, 23 A 829; Meriden Steam Mill Lumber Co. v. Guy, 40 Conn. 163. (3) Thus in Missouri the statute does not begin to run until the or after the administration has been closed or the estate settled,[31] claims arising out of suretyship frequently calling for the application of this principle.[32] It has been held, however, that if there is no personal representative when the claim accrues, the statute does not begin to run until an administrator is appointed.[33] On the other hand, some statutes requiring presentation of claims within a fixed period include, either expressly or by implication, contingent claims,[34] any difficulty as to the right to recover substantial damages accrues. State v. Tittmann, 134 Mo. 162, 35 SW 579; Tenney v. Lasley, 80 Mo. 664; Greenabaum v. Elliott, 60 Mo. 25; Chambers v. Smith, 23 Mo. 174; Miller v. Woodward, 8 Mo. 169. (4) And no distinction is recognized between a merely nominal right of recovery and no right of recovery at all. Chambers v. Smith, supra. (5) Thus while a cause of action accrues on a bond or covenant at the breach thereof, yet where the breach is merely formal and substantial damages afterward result therefrom, the statutory period begins to run only from the time when the right to recover such damages accrues. State v. Tittmann, 134 Mo. 162, 35 SW 579; Chambers v. Smith, supra. (6) Where there has been a change in the statutory period, the statute in force when the cause of action accrued is controlling. Greenabaum v. Elliott, supra.

[d] The claim of surviving partners against the estate of a deceased partner for contribution for losses sustained by the firm is a contingent claim which does not become absolute until the business of the firm is settled, the assets converted, and the debts paid, and which need not be presented for allowance before that time. Logan v. Dixon, 73 Wis. 533, 41 NW 713.

[e] A claim for money loaned and payable on demand which was capable of being enforced by the creditor before the death of the debtor is not within a statute permitting the filing of claims which accrue or become absolute after the time limited for creditors to present their claims and providing that the same may be presented and proved at any time within one year after they shall accrue or become absolute. Barry v. Minahan, 127 Wis. 570, 107 NW 488.

[f] When claim becomes absolute.—A contingent claim does not become absolute, within the meaning of a statute requiring presentation within one year after the claim becomes absolute, until it becomes a claim proper to be presented to the county court for final adjudication as a claim against the estate. Hazlett v. Blakely, 70 Nebr. 613, 97 NW 808.

31. Davis v. Weed, 7 F. Cas. No. 3,658, 44 Conn. 569; State v. Tittmann, 134 Mo. 162, 35 SW 579.

[a] The contingent claim provided for by the Wisconsin statute (1) is one which accrues and becomes absolute before the administration of the estate is closed and before a decree of distribution has been rendered by the county court. The statutes do not apply to a contingent claim which does not accrue and is incapable of being established by proof until after the estate has been fully administered. Such a claim need not be presented for allowance. Mann v. Everts, 64 Wis. 372, 25 NW 209 [dist Ernst v. Nau, 63 Wis. 134, 23 NW 492]. (2) Where the estate has been fully settled and the assets have been distributed before a contingent claim becomes absolute, and the claim is then presented, if the executor or administrator has not sufficient assets to pay the whole of the claim the creditors may recover the balance from the heirs, devisees, or legatees who have received sufficient real and personal property from the debtor's estate. Logan v. Dixon, 73 Wis. 533, 41 NW 713; Mann v. Everts, supra. (3) Liability to refund on deficiency of assets see infra §§ 1424–1437.

[b] Claim accruing after partial settlement of estate. — Under the statute if a creditor, after a contingent claim has become absolute, presents it within the statutory period thereafter, he can be paid only out of the assets still remaining in the hands of the personal representative and not then lawfully distributed or applied to the payment of other debts previously presented and allowed against the estate. Logan v. Dixon, 73 Wis. 533, 41 NW 713.

[b] A claim of a surety for reimbursement from the principal debtor (1) remains contingent until the surety pays the debt, and where the principal debtor dies before payment by the surety, the period in which the surety must present his claim is computed from the time of payment. Cawthorne v. Weisinger, 6 Ala. 714; McBroom v. Governor, 6 Port. (Ala.) 32; Neil v. Cunningham, 2 Port. (Ala.) 171; Savings, etc., Assoc. v. Tartt, 81 Miss. 276, 32 S 115; Burton v. (Tenn.) 57; Webster v. Lawson, 73 Wis. 561, 41 NW 710. (2) And it has been held that the right of the surety to present his claim within the statutory period thereafter is not affected by the fact that the creditor failed to present his own claim against the deceased principal's estate. Cawthorne v. Weisinger, 6 Ala. 714; McBroom v. Governor, 6 Port. (Ala.) 32. (3) But the due presentation of the creditor's claim against the deceased debtor's estate relieves the surety, upon payment of the debt, of the necessity of presenting his claim against the estate, for he is subrogated to the creditor's rights and remedies and stands in the latter's place as to the steps already taken to enforce the claim. Braught v. Griffith, 16 Iowa 26; Fisher v. Columbia Bldg., etc., Assoc., 59 Mo. A. 430.

[c] A claim against the estate of deceased surety on a bond in favor of the obligee named therein accrues at the time when suit might have been brought against the surety if living, and not at the time of the rendition of judgment against the principal and a surviving surety. Hancock Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Hill, 108 Mich. 126, 65 NW 758.

[d] A claim against a surety on a trustee's bond, which is conditioned for a faithful performance of the trustee's duties, does not accrue until a breach of condition by a default of the trustee, and the statute of nonclaim does not begin to run until the breach occurs. McDowell v. Brantley, 80 Ala. 173.

[e] Claim against surety on agent's bond.—Where decedent was surety on a bond given by an agent to plaintiff and conditioned for the faithful performance of his contract of agency until his final discharge, and the agent continued in the employment of plaintiff until after the decedent had died and his estate had been settled, and then absconded in default to plaintiff, it was held that, although parts of plaintiff's claim against the agent might have been deemed due at an earlier date, yet they became merged in the one claim which accrued and matured at the termination of the agency, and the same was a proper claim to be audited and allowed against the decedent's estate after the time limited for that purpose. Michel Brewing Co. v. Wightman, 97 Wis. 657, 75 NW 316.

[f] Claim against surety on personal representative's bond.—A claim against the estate of a deceased surety on the bond of an insolvent executor, for a legacy which vested at the testator's death, must be presented to the surety's personal representative within the prescribed period after the grant of administration, although the time of payment of the legacy was postponed until after the surety's death. Foster v. Holland, 56 Ala. 474.

[g] A claim against a surety on a guardian's bond accrues at the time when the ward dies or attains his majority and the guardian fails forthwith to make a settlement of his accounts; the statute of nonclaim begins to run at this date and is not postponed until a judicial ascertainment of the guardian's liability. amount and time of payment being obviated by some provision for the reservation of sufficient assets to pay such claims when they shall accrue.[35] Some of the statutes provide that contingent claims which cannot be proved or allowed as debts may be presented with the proofs thereof to the probate court, or to the commissioners for a report thereon.[36] Under such statutes a claim which was contingent at the time of the debtor's death but became absolute before the expiration of the time limited for creditors to present their claims to the commissioners cannot thereafter, and while the commission remains open, be properly presented to the probate court for allowance as a contingent claim, but must be presented to the commissioners for allowance as an absolute debt;[37] but where the claim accrues or becomes absolute after the time for presentation to the commissioners has expired, it may be presented to the personal representative within the time limited after its accrual.[38]

[§ 949] d. Claims Not Due. As a general rule claims which are not yet due but run to a certain maturity should be presented within the statutory period.[39] This is sometimes required although the

[a] Presentation in order to participate in inventoried assets.—(1) A contingent claim must be presented within the statutory period in order that claimant may participate in the inventoried assets; if the claim is not presented within that period the creditor will be confined to uninventoried assets subsequently discovered, even though the claim does not accrue until the period has expired. Snydacker v. Swan Land, etc., Co., 154 Ill. 220, 40 NE 466 [rev 51 Ill. A. 211, and disappr Suppiger v. Gruaz, 137 Ill. 216, 27 NE 22]; Stone v. Clarke, 40 Ill. 411. See also Morse v. Pacific R. (2) This rule, however, is entirely distinct from the rule applicable in suits by creditors to enforce against the deceased debtor's heirs and devisees claims which have accrued or become absolute after the period of presentation. Payson v. Hadduck, 19 F. Cas. No. 10,862, 8 Biss. 293; Snydacker v. Swan Land, etc., Co., 154 Ill. 220, 40 NE 466 [rev 51 Ill. A. 211, and dist Dugger v. Ogelsby, 99 Ill. 405]. (3) Rights of unpresented claim as to assets remaining or subsequently discovered see infra § 1033.

[b] Claims becoming absolute before expiration of time for presentation.—Under Gen. St. (1894) §§ 4511, 4514, a contingent claim which arises on a contract and which does not become absolute and capable of liquidation before the expiration of the time limited for creditors to present their claims is not barred, the only contingent claims barred by the statute being those which become certain and absolute before the time fixed for the presentation of claims has expired. Berryhill v. Peabody, 72 Minn. 232, 75 NW 220; Oswald v. Pillsbury, 61 Minn. 520, 63 NW 1072; Hantzch v. Massolt, 61 Minn. 361, 63 NW 1069. To same effect McKeen v. Waldron, 25 Minn. 466. But see Hunt v. Burns, 90 Minn. 172, 95 NW 1110 (although the claim accrues or becomes absolute after the expiration of the time limited for the presentation of claims it will be barred if not presented before the administration is finally closed; the reason being that, under the statute the creditor may on application to the court be allowed to present his claim, although the regular period for presentation has expired); Jorgenson v. Larson, 85 Minn. 134, 88 NW 439 (to similar effect).

[c] A claim on an indemnity covenant in a lease must be presented within the time limited in the notice, although the covenantee was not damaged until after the expiration of the time. Verdier v. Roach, 96 Cal. 467, 31 P 554.

[d] A claim which did not exist until after the expiration of the statutory period for presenting claims is not barred thereby. In re Macdonald, 29 Wash. 422, 69 P 1111.

[e] Undistributed or reserved assets.—A contingent claim or one upon which no recovery against an estate could be predicated until the happening of a particular event cannot be enforced against the deceased's estate if not presented within the statutory period, even as to undistributed assets or assets reserved by the representatives of such estate especially for the purpose of meeting such contingent claim in the event of the same being enforced. [a] A claim against the estate of an administrator, founded upon the latter's failure to pay over to creditors the amount which was in his hands upon the settlement of his account, and which was ordered by the probate court to be paid to them, is an absolute claim which accrued in the lifetime of the administrator and must be prosecuted as such before the commissioners; it cannot properly be allowed by the probate court as a contingent claim. Sargent v. Kimball, 37 Vt. 320.

[b] A note payable absolutely and secured by a real estate mortgage is not, as between the holder and the estate of the maker, a contingent claim within the meaning of the statute. Osmun v. Oakland Cir. Judge, 107 Mich. 27, 64 NW 949.

[c] An indorsement may be allowed as a contingent claim against the estate of decedent. Curley v. Hand, 53 Vt. 524.

[d] Uncertainty as to identity of claimant.—Where there is outstanding against the estate a claim which is due to one person, but which, upon the happening of some future event, which may or may not happen, will become due to another person, the latter is entitled to have it allowed as a contingent claim. Curley v. Hand, 53 Vt. 524.

[e] Liability of widow for breach of covenant.—The liability of decedent's widow who was his devisee and legatee, for a breach of covenant or warranty contained in a deed executed by the testator, was not, under the facts involved, such a contingent claim as required presentation under the statute. [a] The words "justly due," as used in a statute with respect to presentation refer to the validity of the claim and not to the time of its payment. Cassatt v. Vogel, 12 Mo. A. 323.

[b] "All debts and demands."—A statute requiring the presentation of all debts and demands against the estate requires the presentation of debts not due. Fillyau v. Laverty, 3 Fla. 72. But see Sampson v. Sampson, 63 Me. 328 [disappr dictum Webber v. Webber, 6 Me. 127] (holding that L. [1872] c 85 § 14 et seq. did not require the presentation of claims not due).

[c] Accrued claim. — A claim which will certainly become due is an "accrued" claim within the meaning of a statute, requiring claims to be presented within a certain time after they have accrued, and such a claim must be presented although it does not mature within the time specified for presentation. Farris v. Stoutz, 78 Ala. 130. See also King v. Mosely, 5 Ala. 610 (where a distinction is made between an accrued claim and the accrual of the cause of action on a claim).

[d] A contract to pay rent for the whole term, containing a clause providing that for certain contingencies claims will not mature within the time limited for presenting demands;[40] but under other statutes presentation of such claims prior to maturity is not required.[41] Where a claim has been presented and exhibited before the time when payment is due, it is unnecessary to present and exhibit it again after maturity.[42] Provision is, however, sometimes made by statute for the presentation of claims accruing after decedent's death within a certain time after their maturity.[43]

Interest. A statute providing that no interest accruing after his death shall be allowed on any claim against decedent's estate, unless the claim is presented to the personal representative within one year after his appointment, has been held not to apply to a claim not due until after the appointment of the administrator.[44]

[§ 950] e. Unliquidated Claims.[45] While it has been held necessary to present unliquidated claims arising out of contract,[46] there is also authority for the view that unliquidated claims need not be presented.[47]

[§ 951] f. Claims Based on Tort. While it has been held that unliquidated claims based upon tort need not be presented,[48] there are also authorities in which the presentation of such claims has been considered necessary.[49]

[§ 952] g. Claims Arising after Death of Decedent.[50] The statutes of nonclaim usually apply only to claims which existed against decedent in his lifetime, and do not require the presentation of claims which come into existence after his death;[51]

the term may be shortened, may be presented as a claim for allowance and settlement against an estate. McElroy v. Brooke, 104 Ill. A. 220; Kavanaugh v. Shaughnessy, 41 Mo. A. 657; Traylor v. Cabanne, 8 Mo. A. 131.

[e] Uncertain contracts. — Contracts so uncertain as to be declared void at any time on default of payment of installments are not within the purport of a statute providing for the presentation of claims not yet due. Robison v. Harrington, 61 Ill. A. 543.

[f] Where time of maturity uncertain.—The statute with reference to the presentation and allowance of claims not due does not apply to a claim the time of maturity of which is uncertain, and such claim cannot be presented for payment before maturity and a rebate had thereon. Tenney v. Lasley, 80 Mo. 664.

[g] A claim payable on the death of a third person should be presented. Brown v. Dunn, 75 Vt. 264, 55 A 364. Contra Tenney v. Lasley, 80 Mo. 664.

[h] Claims not requiring presentation.—(1) A promissory note payable after the death of a husband and wife and to the husband's heirs, administrators, or assigns need not be presented for allowance before its maturity. Tenny v. Lasley, 80 Mo. 664. (2) A liability on a stock subscription subject to call need not be presented. Fitzgerald v. Union Sav. Bank, 65 Nebr. 97, 90 NW 994.

[i] When failure to present not laches.—Where a beneficiary under a will was not entitled to receive any part of the estate of testator until another beneficiary arrived at the age of thirty years, the failure of the latter and a third person to assert their claims against the estate of the trustee before that time could not prejudice the former, and could not amount to laches as to him. Md.—Coburn v. Harris, 58 Md. 87.

but some statutes which provide that such claims shall be charges against the estate require that they shall be presented to the probate court for inspection and allowance.[52] It has been considered that even though presentation of such claims is not required, they may be presented for the purpose of obtaining an order directing the representative to pay them as expenses of administration,[53] and where claimant has an election to look to the representative personally or to the estate, he must present the claim if he wishes to assert it against the estate.[54]

[§ 953] h. Claims of Representative. Under some statutes the only difference between the claims held by the executor or administrator against the estate and those held by others is that the presentation and proof should be made directly to the court or a judge thereof or to commissioners in the first instance, the representative, as well as other claimants, being required to make presentation within the time limited by statute.[55] But under other statutes the executor or administrator is accorded a full right of retainer of the assets,[56] whether as to his own claim as an ordinary creditor against decedent, or such demands as arise on his behalf in the due course of administration; and he is permitted, regardless of the non-claim barrier, to assert and prove his own claim in the course of an accounting,[57] unless the estate is insolvent.[58]

[a] Reason for rule.—"When a sole executor or administrator has a claim against the estate there is no person to whom he can exhibit his demand under this statute, except himself, and he knows of the existence of the claim without any exhibit of demand. The statute cannot apply to the executor under such circumstances, for the reason that he has notice of the existence of the claim, and his serving upon himself a notice in writing of that claim cannot serve any useful purpose. He would not know any more after the notice had been served than he knew before." In re Hoover, (Kan.) 180 P 275.

[b] Same person administrator of debtor and of creditor.—Where the same person is administrator of the estates of both the creditor and the debtor, no formal presentation of the claim of the estate of the creditor against the estate of the debtor is necessary. Thomas v. Chamberlain, 39 Oh. St. 112.

58. Newell v. West, 149 Mass. 520, 21 NE 954; Green v. Russell, 132 Mass. 536.

[§ 954] i. Judgments. As a general rule the fact that a claim against a decedent has been reduced to judgment does not do away with the necessity of presenting the claim for allowance,[59] especially where the judgment has become dormant.[60] But in some jurisdictions the presentation and filing of a judgment is necessary only in order to secure its payment out of the personal assets and a failure to file the judgment does not affect its lien upon decedent's realty.[61] It has been held, however, that judgments must be presented, even to protect the lien.[62]

Where suit is brought against an administrator to revive a judgment against the intestate, the lien of which has been pursued, presentation of the claim is not necessary.[63]

Where an execution was placed in the hands of the sheriff and the administrator of the judgment debtor, on seeing the execution, applied to the creditor for indulgence, which was granted to him, these facts afforded sufficient proof of a presentation of the demand to avoid a plea of the statute of nonclaim.[64]

Judgment of which representative has obtained modification. When an executrix substituted as defendant, after the death of judgment defendant pending a motion for a new trial, appears on such motion, and obtains a modification of the judgment, such judgment need not be presented to the executrix.[65]

A judgment against the executor or administrator in his representative capacity need not, it has been held, be presented,[66] although a presentation for the purpose of classification is sometimes required.[67]

Presentation of the claim on which the judgment

[a] A judgment is a claim within the meaning of a statute requiring the presentation of all claims against a decedent's estate. Ready v. Thompson, 4 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 52.

[b] A judgment rendered in another state (1) must be presented. Reid v. Bloodworth, (Ala.) 76 S 376. (2) The necessity for presenting such a judgment is not affected by the federal constitutional provision requiring full faith and credit to be given to such judgment. Fields v. Mundy, 106 Wis. 383, 82 NW 343, 80 AmSR 39.

[c] Judgment in another state allowing claim.—A statute barring all claims against the estate if not filed within a certain time applies to a judgment allowing a claim against a decedent in a proceeding to settle his estate in a court of another state. Fields v. Mundy, 106 Wis. 383, 82 NW 343, 80 AmSR 39.

[d] A judgment which merely forecloses a vendor's lien upon real property of the decedent, without including any personal award against the estate, need not be certified to the probate court for payment. Ferguson v. McCrary, 20 Tex. Civ. A. 529, 50 SW 472. But see Converse v. Sorley, 39 Tex. 515, 521 ("we can perceive no reason why an exception should be made in favor of a lien, whether vendor's, by judgment or mortgage").

[e] Set-off in action by administrator.—"The right of a defendant in an action brought by an administrator for the recovery of any debt or claim in favor of his intestate to set off adverse claims is recognized by statute, and in such cases the defendant need not present his demand to the probate court, but may avail himself of the same in the district court without that formality." Martin County Nat. Bank v. Bird, 92 Minn. 110, 112, 99 NW 780.

[f] Purpose of presentation.—(1) In Missouri there is some apparent confusion in the cases as to whether a judgment is to be presented for allowance or merely classification. Beekman v. Richardson, 150 Mo. 430, 51 SW 689; Wernse v. McPike, 100 Mo. 476, 13 SW 809 [overr Wernse v. McPike, 76 Mo. 249; Ewing v. Taylor, 70 Mo. 394; Gibson v. Vaughan, 61 Mo. 418; Carondelet v. Desmoyer, 27 Mo. 36; Bryan v. Mundy, 14 Mo. 458]; Brown v. Woody, 64 Mo. 547; Gewe v. Hanszen, 85 Mo. A. 136. (2) But the question seems to be finally settled in McFaul v. Haley, 166 Mo. 56, 65 SW 995 [foll Wencker v. Thompson, 96 Mo. A. 59, 69 SW 743] (reviewing the earlier decisions and holding that the action of the court upon the judgment presented, even if denominated merely "classifying," is a judgment, and not "a mere ministerial, or clerical or nondescript act," and the proceeding may involve a trial of fact inasmuch as while the court cannot go behind the judgment to inquire into the merits of the cause of action, yet the representative may defeat the claim if he can establish that the judgment has been paid or has for any cause ceased to subsist as a valid demand).

[g] Allowance after expiration of time for filing.—Since an unreversed mortgage foreclosure deficiency judgment against an estate was conclusive against the executor, no one was prejudiced by the allowance of the judgment as a claim against the estate, although the time for filing claims had expired. In re Leiser, 138 Wis. 401, 120 NW 274.

[h] Presentation to commissioners not necessary.—Where defendant dies after a verdict against him, and judgment is thereafter entered without substituting the personal representative, neither the judgment nor the claim need be presented to the commissioners appointed to audit claims, but on a certified copy of the judgment being filed in the probate court it is entitled to be paid. [§ 955] j. Secured Claims. According to the weight of authority, a creditor whose claim is secured by mortgage, pledge, or any specific lien need not present his claim for allowance in order to preserve his right to subject the property covered by the lien to the satisfaction of his claim,[69] for the reason that such claims cannot in any just sense be considered claims against the estate, but the right to subject specific property to the claim arises from the contract of the debtor whereby he has

(4) The lien of a building and loan association for dues and penalties. Mechanics' Bldg., etc., Assoc. v. King, 83 Cal. 440, 23 P 376. (5) A specific lien acquired by levy under execution. Barber v. Peay, 31 Ark. 392; Nordstrom v. Corona City Water Co., 155 Cal. 206, 100 P 242, 132 AmSR 81.

[b] A vendor's lien (1) reserved in the deed need not be presented. Nicholls v. Gee, 30 Ark. 135; Allen v. Smith, 29 Ark. 74; Hall v. Denckla, 28 Ark. 506. (2) The same has been held true of the equitable lien of a vendor. Flinn v. Barber, 61 Ala. 530. (3) But it has also been held that a vendor's equitable lien cannot be distinguished from the debt itself and requires presentation. Linthicum v. Tapscott, 28 Ark. 267 [foll McKneely v. Terry, 61 Ark. 527, 33 SW 953].

[c] An attorney may retain from funds collected for decedent for his services without presentation of his claim to commissioners. Hurlbert v. Brigham, 56 Vt. 368.

[d] A mortgagee's right to foreclose is not affected by the death of the mortgagor. National L. Ins. Co. v. Fitzgerald, 61 Nebr. 692, 85 NW 948.

[e] A power of sale contained in a deed of trust continues in full force after the grantor's death, and no judicial foreclosure is required, and hence in such case a statute allowing an action for foreclosure of a mortgage against a decedent's estate without presentation of the claim secured to the executor or administrator, only "when all recourse against any other property of the estate is expressly waived in the complaint," does not apply. More v. Calkins, 95 Cal. 435, 30 P 583, 29 AmSR 128.

[f] Forfeiture for nonpayment.—A vendor may bring ejectment to enforce a forfeiture for nonpayment of the purchase price without presentation of his claim to the administrator of the purchaser. Kerns v. Dean, 77 Cal. 555, 19 P 817, 65 Cal. 411, 4 P 404.

[h] Liens or encumbrances on the homestead are sometimes required to be presented. Browne v. Sweet, 127 Cal. 332, 59 P 774; McGahey v. Forrest, 109 Cal. 63, 41 P 817; Wise v. Williams, 88 Cal. 30, 25 P 1064; Perkins v. Onyett, 86 Cal. 348, 24 P 1024; Sanders v. Russell, 86 Cal. 119, 24 P 852, 21 AmSR 26; Rosenberg v. Ford, 85 Cal. 610, 24 P 779; Hearn v. Kennedy, 85 Cal. 55, 24 P 606; Mechanics' Bldg., etc., Assoc. v. King, 83 Cal. 440, 23 P 376; Bollinger v. Manning, 79 Cal. 7, 21 P 375; Camp v. Grider, 62 Cal. 20. (2) So where a mortgage on homestead property is executed by a husband and wife, and upon the death of one of them the property is set apart to the survivor, the mortgagee can neither foreclose the mortgage nor have personal judgment on the notes against the survivor unless he first duly presents his claim against the estate. Hibernia Sav., etc., Soc. v. Thornton, 109 Cal. 427, 42 P 447, 50 AmSR 52; Hearn v. Kennedy, 85 Cal. 55, 24 P 606; Mechanics' Bldg., etc., Assoc. v. King, supra; Bollinger v. Manning, supra; Camp v. Grider, supra; Votypka v. Valentine, (Cal. A.) 182 P 76. (3) This is true, even though there are no other assets of the estate that can be subjected to the payment of the mortgage. Bollinger v. Manning, supra.

[i] The requirement of presentation does not apply: (1) Where the homestead did not exist at the time of decedent's death, but was set apart subsequently by the court. McGahey v. Forrest, 109 Cal. 63, 41 P 817. (2) Where a deed of trust has been given by which title is transferred to a trustee. Athearn v. Ryan, 154 Cal. 554, 98 P 390; Weber v. McCleverty, 149 Cal. 316, 86 P 706. (3) Where, in connection with a mortgage on the homestead given to a building and loan association, the stock held by decedent in the association is also pledged, the pledge may be foreclosed without any presentation of claim against the estate. Mechanics' Bldg., etc., Assoc. v. King, 83 Cal. 440, 23 P 376.

[j] An express waiver of recourse against other property (1) is sometimes required in order that a lien may be enforced without presentation. Ryan v. Holliday, 110 Cal. 335, 42 P 891; More v. Calkins, 95 Cal. 435, 30 P 583, 29 AmSR 128; German Sav., etc., Co. v. Fisher, 92 Cal. 502, 28 P 591; Anglo-Nevada Assur. Corp. v. Nadeau, 90 Cal. 393, 27 P 302; Mechanics' Bldg., etc., Assoc. v. King, 83 Cal. 440, 23 P 376; Dreyfuss v. Giles, 79 Cal. 409, 21 P 840; Security Sav. Bank v. Connell, 65 Cal. 574, 4 P 580; Heeser v. Taylor, 1 Cal. A. 619, 92 P 977. (2) A mortgage existing at the time decedent purchased land is not a claim against his estate and is not within such requirement. Ryan v. Holliday, 110 Cal. 335, 42 P 891.

[k] Counsel fees cannot be recovered unless the claim is presented. Sonoma County Bank v. Charles, 86 Cal. 322, 24 P 1019.

during life set aside certain property for its payment, and such property does not, except in so far as its value may exceed the debt, belong to the estate, and the instrument being of record or the property being in the possession of the creditor is notice to all the world of the contract.[70] Nevertheless, in some states the requirement of presentation is held to apply to secured claims,[71] and the right to foreclose is sometimes suspended by statute until the claim has been proved and allowed.[72] Where a mortgagee, pledgee, or other secured creditor seeks to obtain payment either in full or of a deficiency out of the general assets of the estate and thus to enforce his claim against property not covered by his lien or held by him as security, his claim stands on the same footing with the claims of other creditors and must be presented for allowance.[73] The security of a mortgagee, pledgee, or other secured creditor is not affected by his presentation and securing the allowance of his claim.[74]

Right of heirs with respect to exoneration of land. Where intestate died indebted to a bank on a demand note secured by a mortgage on real estate, the heirs were held entitled to have intestate's personal assets applied as far as possible by the administrator in payment of such note and mortgage, to the exoneration of the land, although the note was not filed as a claim against the estate, and no demand was made by the holder for payment out of the personal estate.[75]

Man.—Frontenac Loan Co. v. Morrice, 4 Man. 442.

"The mortgagee may waive his mortgage and pursue the debtor upon his obligation to pay. That is, he may sue upon the note to secure which the mortgage was given and waive the security. So a mortgagee having a debt against an estate may file his debt as a claim without pursuing the land pledged as security for the debt. Of course, if the mortgagee seeks to enforce his claim against the estate and waive his mortgage, he must file his claim as required by law, and within the time provided by law, unless some equitable reason is shown why it was not filed before the expiration of the period allowed for filing claims. But this rule does not apply where a devisee of specific real estate, which is incumbered by a mortgage, applies to have the mortgage discharged out of the personal assets in the hands of the executor." In re Brackey, 166 Iowa 109, 116, 147 NW 188.

[a] Claim based on assumption of mortgage.—A claim against the estate of a decedent on his assumption of a mortgage is, before foreclosure, only contingent, and consequently cannot be proved as a debt against his estate before that time. Terhune v. White, 34 N. J. Eq. 98 [foll Field v. Thistle, 58 N. J. Eq. 339, 43 A 1072 (aff 60 N. J. Eq. 444, 46 A 1099)].

[b] Allowing security to be otherwise disposed of.—A claim on a note originally secured by chattel mortgage is barred by nonpresentation, although the mortgagee permitted the mortgaged property to be sold under the belief that there was plenty of property to pay the debts of the decedent and the administrator agreed that he should be paid. Colby v. King, 67 Iowa 458, 25 NW 704.

[c] Presentation of claim before enforcing security.—A claim founded upon a bond of decedent secured by mortgage may be presented to the administrator before the mortgaged premises are sold. Smith v. Crater, 43 N. J. Eq. 636, 12 A 530.

presentation does not apply to the claims of a cestui que trust for whom decedent was trustee so long as the trust fund or property can be traced and the trust enforced by suitable proceedings;[76] but where the fund or property cannot be traced and the cestui que trust seeks redress as a general creditor of the estate, he must present his claim.[77]

[§ 957] 3. Against Whom Statutes of Nonclaim Run.[78] The limitation of time within which claims must be presented for allowance in the probate court is inseparable from the peculiar procedure prescribed in each jurisdiction;[79] it is a part of that procedure and so not like a general statute of limitations, and can be applied only to persons who are bound by such special mode of procedure.[80] But where the statute of nonclaim makes no exception as to any persons or class of persons, the courts can make none;[81] and hence in the absence of some provision to the contrary, the statutes of nonclaim run against nonresident as well as resident,[82] and

[a] Reasons for rule.—(1) The cestui que trust "is seeking his own property only.—not to enforce a claim against the estate and property of the decedent." Roach v. [b] Illustration.—The statutes providing for the pesentation of claims against decedents' estates before suit do not apply to an asserted ownership of a decedent's property based on the existence of a trust created by decedent in her lifetime for the benefit of plaintiff, based on a contract, supported by valuable consideration, binding decedent to adopt plaintiff and give all her property to plaintiff. Furman v. Craine, 18 Cal. A. 41, 46, 121 P 1007 ("Plaintiff did not claim that the estate was indebted to her, and she held no claim payable out of the estate in course of administration. Her contention is that she is the sole beneficiary of a trust impressed upon the property remaining after the payment of costs of administration and all claims against it, and as such equitable owner entitled to a conveyance thereof from those holding the legal title").

[c] Decree construing trust binding on parties.—Where a court having jurisdiction construed a testamentary trust, and intestate in obedience to the decree segregated the trust fund from his other property in acceptance of the trust, the decree became binding on all the parties then before the court as the law of the estate, so that it was unnecessary that the claim for such trust fund should have been presented by the parties entitled thereto as against intestate's estate to entitle them to maintain an action to recover the fund. Kauffman v. Foster, 3 Cal. A. 741, 86 P 1108.

[d] The proper method of reaching realty in the hands of distributees which was held in trust by decedent, or the proceeds of funds held in trust by him is to procure an order of sale from the probate court after establishing the validity of the claim against the estate, and not by a suit in equity to impress the property with a trust. [a] Who are nonresident creditors.—The question whether a creditor is or is not a resident creditor is determined by his residence at the time of the grant of letters of administration on the debtor's estate, and his subsequent removal into the state will not take him out of the statutory exception in favor of nonresident creditors. Humbard v. Smith, 10 Yerg. (Tenn.) 249.

[b] Absence of creditor from state.—(1) Under a statute providing that when it shall be made to appear by affidavit of the claimant "to the satisfaction" of the executor, administrator, or probate court, that the claimant had no knowledge of the notice to present claims, by reason of his absence from the state, his claim may be presented at any time before final distribution, the officers named have no right arbitrarily to say that they are not satisfied, and to therefore reject a claim. Cullerton v. Mead, 22 Cal. 95. (2) One who knew of deceased's death, was present in the state during the first two publications of the notice to present claims, returned to the state, and had actual notice of the publication for more than one month prior to the expiration of the time for filing claims, but yet failed to do so until long after that time had expired, was not one who, "by reason of being out of the state," had no notice "as provided in this chapter" to present his claim, within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 1493, and his claim was therefore barred. MacGowan v. Jones, 142 Cal. 593, 76 P 503.

[c] Meaning of term "beyond the seas."—A person in California, being within the national limits of the United States, is not "beyond the seas," within the meaning of such phrase in a statute, limiting the time for the presentation of claims. Mason v. Johnson, 24 Ill. 159, 76 AmD 740.

[d] "Out of the state."—A nonresident creditor, after commencement of an action against the executor, which was dismissed, ceases to be a creditor "out of the state," and is no longer entitled to the benefit of the statute. Yoast v. Willis, 9 Ind. 548.

[e] Partnership.—(1) Claims due a partnership, one member of which is a nonresident, must be presented within the time limited for the presentation of claims by residents. Allen v. Farrington, 2 Sneed (Tenn.) 526. (2) But where the resident member assigns, prior to the debtor's death, his interest in the debt due the firm to the nonresident members, they may present the claim within the time limited for the presentation of claims by nonresidents. Bailey v. Brooks, 11 Heisk. (Tenn.) 1.

[f] A foreign corporation is not within the benefit of such a statute merely because its technical principal place of business is in the state of its incorporation, where all its property is located within the state where the administration is pending, all its officers and agents are there, all meetings of its directors are held there, all its business is transacted there and it was organized to carry on business in such state. by order of court within limits prescribed by statute.[91] As to the time of presentation the statutes of nonclaim, not the general statutes of limitations, are controlling,[92] although where there is no controlling or applicable statute of nonclaim, the general statute of limitations will be applied by analogy to furnish a limit to the time within which claims may be presented,[93] and where, through the failure of the personal representative to proceed with the usual and ordinary settlement of the estate, the statute of nonclaim cannot be called into operation, the general statute of limitations will revive and run against claims from the date of the representative's appointment and qualification.[94] It has also been held that in the absence of statute claims must be presented within a reasonable time.[95] When the statute requires that the court shall by its order fix the times and places for receiving and examining claims, and shall give notice of such times and places and of the time limited for presenting claims, the order must state such times and places,[96] and the notice must be given according to the terms of the statute or claims not presented will not be barred.[97] The notice cannot cure defects in the original order.[98] Where the statute provides that a period for presenting claims shall be fixed by the court, and that after the expiration of this period the court shall, by final decree, order that all claims not presented within that period shall be barred except as to subsequently discovered assets, the fixed period is not extended by implication until the rendition of the final decree, and a claim is barred if not presented within the time limited.[99] The presentation of claims is not conditional upon the inventory; but the creditors must Morrissett v. Carr, 127 Ala. 277, 27 S 844. (2) A statute disallowing interest on claims unless demand was made within one year does not apply where the administrator qualified before the law took effect. Holmes v. Lusk, 78 Ky. 548.

Wolfe v. Knapp, 127 Iowa 479, 103 NW 369. (2) Although Mills St. Annot. § 4784 provides that claimants may exhibit claims after the day fixed by the administrator upon giving ten days' notice of the time they intend to present the same, where notice was not given within one year from the grant of letters the claim was barred under § 4780. Alvater v. Central City First Nat. Bank, 45 Colo. 528, 103 P 378. (3) Orphans' Act (P. L. [1898] p 741) § 76, providing that, in any suit for a legacy or distributive share, it shall be no defense that there are disputed claims outstanding against the estate, if the executor shall have neglected for six months to obtain an order to limit creditors and to proceed thereon according to law, unless a suit brought within a year from the granting of probate be pending on such claim, merely permits a legatee to prosecute his suit to judgment, which will not be enforced pending the ultimate settlement of the estate, and such section or a decree barring creditors provided for by the act operate only to protect the executor from molestation by belated claims of creditors, so that the estate may be speedily settled, and do not operate as a limitation against the claims of creditors. file their claims within the time limited or be barred, and are not entitled to wait until an inventory is filed showing property which can be devoted to the payment of debts.[1]

A claim of the representative, when presentation thereof is required,[2] must be presented within the same time as a claim of any other creditor,[3] but where the private account of one executor was paid by the others shortly after appointment of the executors, it was held that the fact that no application for allowance thereof was made until after the statutory limit for suits against the executors had passed did not render it barred by limitations.[4]

An order discharging an executor or administrator before the expiration of the time allowed for filing claims is not binding on persons without notice thereof, and such persons have a right to file claims during the remainder of the period.[5]

[§ 959] b. Computation of Time.[6] Under some statutes the period within which claims against an estate must be presented runs from the time when letters testamentary or of administration are granted,[7] not from the representative's advertisement or publication of notice;[8] and it has been held that until administration has been granted the statute of nonclaim does not begin to run.[9] In computing the period of limitation under these statutes the day on which the letters were granted is excluded.[10] Other statutes fix the time within which claims must be presented at a certain period after the publication of a notice setting forth the grant of letters or calling on creditors to present their claims,[11] but such statutes have been held not to preclude the presentation of claims before notice is published.[12] Statutes are also found under which the time runs from the date of the order of the court, directing the publication of notice for the presentation of claims.[13] Again under some statutes which require claims to be filed in court rather than presented to the executor or administrator, the time for filing begins to run from the death of decedent.[14] Under some statutes a claim is barred if not presented within a certain time before final settlement of the estate,[15] but a statute prohibiting the filing of claims against an estate after the order for partition and distribution permits by implication the filing of claims at any time prior thereto, although the representative's application for final settlement is on file.[16] Under a statute requiring that commissioners be appointed to allow claims against an estate, and that the court or judge fix the time and place for the presentation of claims the rights of creditors to enforce their demands are not barred so long as no commissioners are appointed and no time or place is fixed.[17] Where the statutes require that the time for exhibiting claims against an estate be fixed by an order of court, the time is computed from the making of the order and not from its publication,[18] but the day on which the order is made is excluded from the computation.[19] Where testator gave his whole estate to his executors in trust, with power of sale to pay debts, etc., to be exercised when they deemed advisable, and his real property was encumbered and unsalable, and the executors made no sale thereof for ten years after his death, during which time they had no assets to pay debts, the executors were trustees of the creditors, so that limitations did not run until the sale of the real estate.[20]

[§ 960] c. Postponement and Interruption of Statute[21]—(1) In General. It is generally held that the statute of nonclaim, when once it begins to run, continues to run, no exceptions or interruptions being allowed to intervene unless expressly provided for,[22] but provision is sometimes made for claims accruing after the expiration of the limited period.[23] Where, notwithstanding a suit to enforce specific performance of decedent's alleged contract to convey certain land to claimant in consideration of his services, claimant filed a claim in proper time consisting of seventeen items, including one relating to purchases for or improvements on land for decedent and another relating to a note for money borrowed, a notice served on the administrator that the items other than those specified were, "for the present, withdrawn," and that the two excepted items were to come on for trial, the remaining items being held until determination of a claim for specific performance, the items withdrawn were never dismissed from the claim filed but, even if they were, claimant was entitled to refile them within five months after the final disposition of the claim for specific performance and while the estate remained unsettled.[24]

[§ 961] (2) Fraudulent Concealment of Claim or Cause of Action. It is generally held that unless otherwise provided by the statute, the fraudulent concealment of the existence of a claim or

[b] A premature settlement by the representative cannot operate to defeat a creditor's right to file his claim, and the fact that the representative has no notice of the claim does not justify a settlement in advance of the time named in the statute. cause of action, either by decedent in his lifetime [25] or by his personal representative,[26] does not affect the operation of the nonclaim statute or defer the beginning of the statutory period to the time when the facts are discovered, and that provisions of the general statute of limitations on this point are not applicable by analogy.[27] But on the other hand there is authority for the view that claimant may be afforded equitable relief under such circumstances.[28]

[§ 962] (3) Absence of Representative from State. It has been held that, where the statute of nonclaim has begun to run it will continue, notwithstanding the personal representative removes from the state and continues absent until the statutory period has expired;[29] and where the statutes require that the personal representative shall notify creditors to present their claims at the place where he resides or transacts business, claims may be legally presented at such place whether the representative is there to receive them or not, and therefore his absence from the state is immaterial.[30] But there is also authority for the view that if the executor or administrator by his absence from the state prevents the presentation of a claim the claim will not be barred,[31] although a merely temporary absence which does not prevent the creditor from presenting his claim by the exercise of reasonable diligence will not extend the statutory period.[32] If, however, there are two executors it is only the period during which both are absent that will be excluded.[33] It is sometimes expressly provided by statute that the period of the representative's absence from the state shall be excluded in computing the period for presentation.[34]

[§ 963] (4) Vacancy in Office of Representative. It has been held that, where the statutory period begins to run from the date of the issuance of letters testamentary or of administration,[35] any interval in the administration because of a vacancy in the office of executor or administrator must be excluded in computing the time.[36] But it has also been asserted that the death of the personal representative, after the issuance of letters, does not interrupt the running of such a statute [37] for the reason that the creditor can have another administrator appointed or can himself apply in certain cases, and hence presentation of his claim is not impossible.[38]

[§ 964] (5) Premature Discharge of Representative. The statutory time for filing claims has been held to be suspended during the time a premature order of discharge of an executor or administrator remains of record,[39] but it has also been considered that an unauthorized discharge of the representative before settlement of the estate, being a nullity, does not excuse a creditor's failure to exhibit his claim.[40]

[§ 965] (6) Death of Creditor. The running of the statute is not interrupted by the death of the creditor,[41] nor does an appeal from the probate of the creditor's will relieve his executors from the necessity of presenting his claim against the debtor's estate within the period limited.[42]

Where a creditor disappeared two years before his debtor's death and was never heard from, there was no presumption that he was not living during the period for presenting claims against the deceased debtor's estate, and the period was not extended.[43]

[§ 966] (7) Appeal from Probate.[44] Where an order is made limiting the time for the presentation of claims against a testator's estate, a subsequent appeal from an order admitting the will to probate does not suspend the period of limitation.[45]

[§ 967] (8) War. It has been held that the statutes of nonclaim did not run in the seceding states during the Civil War,[46] and on the other hand that, where the statute began to run before the civil law was suspended on account of the war, it did not stop running,[47] and that constitutional provisions suspending the statute of limitations during the Civil War did not apply to the statutes of nonclaim.[48] A statute passed during the war of the Revolution disabling British subjects from suing in the state courts was held to suspend the operation of the state statute of nonclaim.[49]

[§ 968] d. Extension by Agreement with Representative. The personal representative has authority to make a contract with a creditor of the estate, whereby the time of payment of the creditor's claim is extended, provided that the contract is for the benefit of the estate, and such a contract operates to extend the period limited for the presentation of the claim and relieves the creditor from the imputation of laches if he presents his claim

[a] The fact that claimant did not discover fraud on the part of a decedent until after the expiration of the time fixed for filing claims against his vendor's estate does not extend the time for filing his claim. Burling v. Allvord, 77 Nebr. 861, 110 NW 683.

within the period thus extended,[50] but where such a contract would be prejudicial to the interests of the estate, it cannot be given this effect.[51]

[§ 969] e. Presentation before Appointment of Representative. While it is obviously improper to present a claim against an estate before the appointment of a personal representative, it has been held that an administrator cannot object that a claim against the estate was presented to him several days before his appointment, where he held it a year thereafter before rejecting it.[52]

[§ 970] 5. Place of Presentation. Where a certain place is designated for the presentation of claims to the personal representative, presentation at that place is sufficient, although the representative is not there to receive the claim.[53] Under a statute authorizing presentation to be made to the personal representative at his residence or place of business, the words "place of business" are construed to include the place selected for the transaction of the business of the estate, although the representative may be engaged in business elsewhere,[54] and the designation in the notice to creditors of a certain place where claims shall be presented makes that place the representative's residence or place of business within the meaning of the statute.[55] A statute providing that presentation may be made by filing the claim, or a statement thereof, in the "office" of the judge of probate does not authorize presentation of the claim in the probate court or in the court of chancery.[56] Filing a copy of the claim with the clerk of the county court within the statutory period is sometimes sufficient to keep the claim from being barred,[57] and presentation to the representative has been held to be equally effective.[58]

[§ 971] 6. By and to Whom Presentation Made —a. By Whom Made. The presentation of a claim may be made by any person who has an interest in the claim, and a legal or equitable right to enforce it,[59] and only by such a person.[60] If the creditor is of full age he is the proper person to present his claim; there is no authority for his appearance by a next friend,[61] although if he is not mentally competent to make an affidavit the claim should be presented by his guardian or a committee of his person and estate.[62] A valid presentation may be made by the equitable owner of the claim,[63] but if the claim is presented in the name of the legal owner, an appeal from disallowance is properly taken in his name.[64] The assignee of a claim may present and enforce it in his own name,[65] and a claim against the estate of a deceased surety on an executor's bond may be filed in the name of the actual claimant, although it is provided by statute that actions on executors' bonds shall be prosecuted in the name of the people for the use of the persons injured.[66] The properly appointed and duly qualified[67] executor or administrator of a deceased creditor has, of course, full authority to present claims in favor of the estate which he represents,[68] and he may exercise this authority at any time before his formal discharge and during the period of presentation, although his final settlement has been filed and an order of distribution entered.[69] It has also been held that a claim may be presented by the heirs of a deceased claimant.[70] Presentation may be made by a lawfully authorized agent of claimant,[71] but unless otherwise provided by statute the personal representative of the deceased debtor has no authority to present the claim of a creditor against the estate,[72] and a statute providing for the presentation of claims of the estate by way of set-off to the claims of creditors does not authorize the personal representative to present a creditor's claim for the purpose of setting off against it a claim of the estate against the creditor.[73] No one but the creditor himself or a person duly authorized by him can make a presentation of a claim against an estate so as to bind the creditor,[74] and a presentation by a person having no interest in the claim is a nullity and will not avoid the operation of the statute of nonclaim.[75] So where the statement of the claim shows a cause of action in favor of a person other than claimant, it is insufficient.[76] But the fact that a person not interested is united with the real owner of a claim filed is immaterial, since a payment to either would be by consent of the other, their association being voluntary.[77] It has been held that if a claim is presented by the wrong person and it appears that it is a proper claim for adjustment against the estate, the court may allow the proper person to appear and prosecute the demand;[78] and where a claim presented by an unauthorized person is disallowed, it has been held that upon becoming vested with the proper authority the person who presented the claim may, by taking an appeal from the order of disallowance, ratify and make valid the original presentation.[79] Where the creditor died, leaving a nonintervention will,[80] presentation of the claim by his executor as his own individual claim was sufficient, where the executor was the sole heir and sole beneficiary under the will, and the will had been filed for probate before the claim was presented, although it had not been admitted to probate.[81]

their rights as fixed by the judgment rendered in the creditors' action.[83]

[§ 972] b. To Whom Made. While presentation is ordinarily made to the personal representative,[84] this rule is not universal, and under some statutes the presentation is properly made to the court,[85] to the clerk of the court,[86] or to commissioners appointed to pass on claims.[87] Where a claim has been presented to an executor or administrator lawfully holding the office at the time of such presentation, his subsequent removal, resignation, or death, or the revocation of his letters, and the appointment of a new representative, does not necessitate a new presentation of the claim to the latter.[88] The presentation of a claim to the personal representative before his qualification [89] or after he has been discharged [90] is of no effect. As a general rule if there are two or more personal representatives presentation of a claim to one of them is sufficient.[91] It is not ordinarily proper to present claims to an administrator pendente lite,[92] or ad colligendum,[93] although presentation to a representative of the latter class is sometimes permitted,[94] and a presentation by a nonresident creditor to an ancillary administrator appointed in another state is insufficient as regards the distribution of the assets in the state in which primary administration was granted.[95] If the statute requires presentation to be made to the personal representative and does not provide for presentation to his agent or attorney, claims must be presented to the representative in person, and the presentation to his agent or attorney is insufficient, unless it is shown that the agent or attorney delivered the demand or notice to his principal in due time.[96] The law does not contemplate that in a mere claim against a decedent's estate third persons shall be joined as defendants with the representative.[97] The allowance of a claim against a partnership is not an exhibition of the claim against the individual estate of a deceased partner.[98] Where a note was payable to a partnership of which the administrator was a member, it was proper to present it to the probate court for allowance without having presented it to the administrator under a statute providing that an administrator may establish any demand of his against his intestate by presenting and proving it to the satisfaction of the court.[99]

[§ 973] 7. Notice to Creditors [1]—a. Necessity for Notice. The personal representative is generally required by statute to publish a notice to creditors, informing them of his appointment or of the granting of letters to him, and calling upon them to present their claims, the statutes usually making express provision as to the time when the notice shall be given, the manner and period of publication, etc.[2] In some states under the statutes of which commissioners are appointed to examine claims against decedent's estates, the notice to creditors of the time limited for filing claims is required to be given by the commissioners.[3] Unless the statutes expressly so provide, the giving of notice to creditors by the personal representative is in no sense a prerequisite to his entering upon the discharge of his duties,[4] and his failure to give the notice does not operate to annul his appointment.[5] In some jurisdictions the statutes providing for the publication of notice by the personal representative are intended solely for his own protection, and so far as concerns the rights of creditors to payment out of the estate there is no legal obligation on him to give notice at all;[6] but in these jurisdictions, as in others, if the personal representative has paid out the assets to legatees or distributees, he cannot escape personal liability to an unpaid creditor without showing full compliance with the statutes requiring notice.[7] Where the period for presenting claims dates from some time

[b] A distinction, however, is to be observed between cases where the creditor's failure to make due and proper presentation of his claim affects his right to share in the assets of the estate, and cases where it affects merely his right of action against the personal representative, as where the statute is intended for the latter's protection; in the latter class of cases it is held that if the personal representative, without statutory authority, appoints an agent or attorney to receive claims, he cannot avail himself of the protection of the statute. other than the publication of notice to creditors by the representative, the omission of the representative to give this notice does not relieve the creditors from the necessity of presenting their demands, but the statute of nonclaim runs whether the notice is published or not,[8] it being held that, so far as the statute of nonclaim is concerned, the requirements as to notice are merely directory.[9] But where the period for presenting the claims begins at the publication of notice to creditors,[10] the statute of nonclaim does not operate to bar claims not presented unless notice has been given within the time and in the manner prescribed by law,[11] and it has been held that unless such notice has been duly given, an order cannot properly be made closing the allowance of claims.[12] If the proper statutory notice has been given, the creditor's want of actual notice is not material and will not affect the running of the nonclaim statute against his demand,[13] unless the latter statute excepts from its operation, as it does in some states, creditors who have not received notice.[14] It has been said that creditors of an estate are not bound to take any cognizance of a notice the publication of which is not made within the time stated in the statute.[15] But it has been held that actual notice that the debtor has died and that administration has been granted upon his estate has the same effect as the statutory notice, and necessitates the creditor's compliance with the statute of nonclaim, although the personal representative wholly neglects to give the notice required by law,[16] especially where the creditor deals with the appointee as the legal representative of the estate.[17] Where the personal representative seeks to enforce a claim of his own against the estate, he cannot take advantage of his own neglect to give the statutory notice to creditors.[18] The failure of the personal representative to give notice to creditors does not affect the general statute of limitations,[19] or estop him from claiming the benefit of that statute.[20]

[§ 974] b. Sufficiency of Notice and Publication—(1) In General. In jurisdictions where notice to creditors is necessary, all the statutory requirements as to the notice and as to the time, place, and manner of its publication must be strictly complied with;[21] but the statutes should be given a construction which will be reasonable, in view of

(2) And where letters pendente lite have been revoked by the grant of letters testamentary or of administration, the new representative should give the statutory notice to creditors, although such notice may have been given by his predecessor. In re Worthington, 54 Md. 359.

[d] A successor to the first administrator must give notice for the full statutory period less the time during which notice was given by the first administrator. In re Jameson, local conditions as to means and facilities for publication,[22] and slight errors and omissions which are not misleading and do not affect the substance of the notice are immaterial.[23] If the statute does not prescribe any particular form, the notice should be made so ample, full, and clear in its terms that it will operate as a warning to creditors.[24] An administrator may authorize his attorney to sign a notice to creditors in the administrator's name and on his behalf,[25] and it has also been held that the notice need not be signed by the representative, but signature of the clerk of the court is sufficient.[26] If the statute imposes upon the personal representative the duty to publish the notice in a newspaper, and does not restrict him in his choice, the selection of the newspaper rests with him.[27] Under a statute providing that the notice shall be published as often as the court or judge shall direct, but not less than a specified number of times in a stated period, the order of the court or judge need not specify the period or frequency of publication unless the court requires more than the minimum fixed by law.[28] Publication in advance of the order directing or regulating the notice has been held invalid,[29] but a first publication made after the order for publication was signed is valid, although it was made before such order was entered.[30]

Notice of appointment of administrator. A notice directing persons having claims against the estate to present them within a specified time, and signed by the administrator as such, has been held a sufficient notice of his appointment.[31]

[§ 975] (2) Statement of Time for Presenting Claims. Although it is better practice for the notice to specify the time for the presentation of claims,[32] this is not necessary in the absence of express statutory requirement, but it is sufficient if it calls for presentation "within the time prescribed by law."[33] It has been held, however, that if the personal representative undertakes to state in the notice the period for presentation, he must do so correctly, and if the notice provides that claims shall be presented within a longer period than that prescribed by statute, it is nugatory and claims will not be barred by failure to present within the statutory period.[34] Under a statute providing for a longer period for presentation, where the value of the estate exceeds a certain sum, and requiring the period to be stated in the representative's notice to creditors, if the representative erroneously states a shorter period he does not thereby affect the creditors' rights to present their claims within the longer period.[35]

[§ 976] (3) Statement of Place for Presenting Claims. Under a statute requiring that the notice shall direct the creditors to present their claims to the personal representative at the place of his residence or business, to be specified in the notice, if the notice states the place for presentation it need not further state that the designated place is the representative's residence or place of business.[36] A notice signed by the administrators and dated at a certain place has been held sufficient to designate their place of business.[37]

[§ 977] c. Waiver of Irregularities. A creditor may waive irregularities in the notice or its publication by failing to object thereto at the proper time.[38] of a creditor, he must affirmatively prove that he gave the statutory notice to creditors in the manner and within the time prescribed by law.[39] Publication of the notice may be proved by producing the newspaper containing it.[40] Some statutes provide that the giving of the statutory notice may be proved by affidavit,[41] but under such a statute the affidavit has been held to be only prima facie evidence, the newspaper in which the notice was published being more satisfactory evidence of its contents,[42] and it has been held that the giving of due notice may be proved by any competent evidence, the affidavit being deemed unnecessary.[43] Where the statute requires that an order or decree be made showing that due notice to creditors has been given, performance of this requirement may be compelled by mandamus,[44] but in order to authorize the court to make such a decree there must be proof of compliance with the statute by filing a copy of the notice in court,[45] and such an order or decree is not conclusive, but may be contradicted by evidence that the publication was insufficient.[46] It has been held that a statute requiring proof of publication of the notice to be filed with the clerk of the court within a certain time is directory, not mandatory, and that, where the publication has in fact been duly made the date of the filing of proof is not jurisdictional,[47] but another statute requiring the executor or administrator to file in court a copy of the publication of notice to creditors with a statement of the date of its first publication and the name of the newspaper has been considered mandatory.[48] The jurisdiction of commissioners to hear and allow claims does not depend upon the making of proof before them that notice to creditors of the hearing and allowance has been published;[49] but if such notice has in fact been published the commissioners may act, although no formal proof thereof is made before them.[50] The statutes requiring that notice be given and proof thereof made are intended for the benefit of creditors, and a residuary legatee, not being a creditor, is not entitled to object at the final settlement that the proof of publication of the notice was irregular, especially where he has not been injured by the irregularity.[51]

[a] Service upon one of two administrators only.—A claim against an estate can be allowed, although the summons was served on one of two administrators only and was void for want of a seal, where such do not provide that heirs and distributees shall have notice of claims presented for allowance against the estate, circumstances may exist under which it becomes the legal duty of the representative to give notice to the heirs, distributees, or other persons interested in the estate.[57]

[§ 982] 10. Sufficiency of Presentation—a. In General. As a general rule a creditor can exhibit his claim against the estate of his deceased debtor only in the manner indicated by the local statute.[58] A substantial compliance with the provisions of the statute may, however, be sufficient,[59] especially where accepted by the probate court in passing upon the claim.[60]

Filing. Placing a file mark on an envelope containing a claim has been held to be a sufficient filing.[61]

[§ 983] b. To Representative. To constitute a valid presentation to the executor or administrator the claim must be properly brought to his notice, and the creditor must plainly show an intention to look to the estate for payment,[62] but the creditor is not required to prove his claim when presented.[63] A claim is presented when it is exhibited to the representative[64] and filed in the probate court,[65] and as a rule no particular formalities are required,[66]

(2) So where an executor and his wife, who were beneficiaries under the will, and who had boarded testator, stated to the other beneficiaries their satisfaction with the terms of the will, and that the provisions for them in the will were doubtless for the care they had bestowed on testator out of their affection for him, it was a fraud for the executor to thereafter file a claim against the estate without giving the other beneficiaries personal notice thereof, and to have the claim allowed without oath or proof and on service by publication. Parish v. Hedges, 34 App. (D. C.) 21.

[b] The claim of a surety on an appeal bond of deceased, who paid the amount due under his obligation on the appeal being dismissed, and filed a claim therefor against the estate, was not on a judgment, within a statute, providing the manner of exhibiting such a claim, although to the claim was attached the transcript of the judgment docket, bearing the written assignment to him of the judgment. [b] Personal presentation to the administrator is sufficient. Weller v. Rensford, 185 Ala. 333, 64 S 366.

[c] A personal interview between the creditor and the representative is not necessary. Gansevoort v. Nelson, 6 Hill (N. Y.) 389.

A. 73, 54 SW 367 (holding that the mailing of a claim to the personal representative is not such a presentation as is required). (2) Where a claim was presented against a decedent's estate in the form of a letter, but the parties, in disregard of the informal presentation, adopted the letter as the basis of the issue, by consent referred the same, and litigated, without objection, every question on which it was based, plaintiff became entitled to recover, if, on any theory presented by the evidence, he established a valid, legal demand against the estate. Merino v. Munoz, 99 App. Div. 201, 90 NYS 985.

[f] Note not left in possession of executor.—The presentation of a note to the executor, the validity of which he acknowledges and upon which he makes part payment, is a sufficient filing, although the note is not left in possession of the executor. but it is sufficient to make a display or profert of the claim, accompanied by a proper voucher or affidavit, and give the representative a reasonable opportunity to examine into and determine for himself the justness and validity of the demand.[67] A claim was not sufficiently presented, where the claimant went several times to the office specified in the notice, and, not finding the executor there, finally left it with an employee after the time for presentation.[68]

[§ 984] c. To Court. Under some statutes the claimant may, as a substitute for presenting the claim to the executor or administrator, file the claim in the probate court;[69] and under others he is required to present the claim to the court in the first instance.[70] The delivery of the claim to the clerk of the probate court,[71] or to the probate judge,[72] is a sufficient filing or presentation to the probate court, and the claim may be filed in vacation as well as in term time.[73] But a claim filed in the office of the probate judge must be brought to the attention of the judge or his clerk within the statutory period, and merely placing it in a box appropriated for such papers without the knowledge of the judge or his clerk is insufficient.[74] So also a claimant who makes out the claim and takes it to the home of the clerk of the probate court to have it sworn to, without requesting the clerk to file it, does not thereby file the claim.[75] If, however, the creditor properly files his claim or a proper statement thereof, he has discharged his duty, and the fact that the judge in docketing the claim describes it insufficiently cannot affect the creditor's rights.[76]

[§ 985] d. Statement and Verification of Claims—(1) Statement—(a) Necessity for Writing. The statutes requiring the presentation or filing of claims usually expressly provide or clearly contemplate that the claims shall be stated in writing;[77] and it has been considered that, even though the statute does not expressly so require, claims against an estate ought properly to be presented in writing,[78] although there is also authority for the view that claims need not be presented in writing, unless expressly required by statute.[79] Casual conversations with the personal representative regarding the claim do not amount to a sufficient presentation;[80] nor is it sufficient merely to mention the approximate amount of a claim to the representative and show him a bill of items for a portion thereof.[81]

[§ 986] (b) Form and Requisites. No fixed form is ordinarily required, nor is the technical accuracy and certainty of description which is essential in pleading necessary. All that is necessary as a general rule is that the statement shall give notice that a claim exists against the estate, for payment of which the creditor looks to the estate, that the statement shall be so clear and unambiguous as to distinguish the claim with reasonable cer-

the amount of the note, amount of a payment thereon, and the interest due, the note was sufficiently presented. Batchelder v. White, 82 Vt. 132, 71 A 1111.

[b] Failure to object to the form of presentation may amount to a waiver of defects. Ross v. Knox, 71 N. H. 249, 51 A 910.

67. Willis v. Marks, 29 Or. 493, 45 P 293.

[a] Right to possession of evidence of claim.—The representative upon presentation of a claim has no right to retain the written evidence of the claim, that is, the statement and voucher or affidavit, for a longer period of time than will be sufficient for him properly to inspect it and determine upon its justness and validity. While he can retain the claim for a reasonable time, this is the extent of his right and beyond this the creditor is entitled to the possession of the claim and may recover it by an action of replevin. Wash.—Parkes v. Burkhart, 101 Wash. 659, 172 P 908.

"It is not required that a claim against an estate should state the facts with all the preciseness and detail required in a complaint, and the sufficiency of such a claim is not to be tested by the rules applicable to pleadings. It should, of course, as said in McGrath v. Carroll, 110 Cal. 79, 42 Pac. 466, 'sufficiently indicate the nature and amount of the demand to enable the executor and judge in probate to act advisedly upon it.'" Pollitz v. Wickersham, 150 Cal. 238, 250, 88 P 911 [quot Elizalde v. Murphy, 163 Cal. 681, 689, 126 P 978].

"No more is required of the claimant than the identification of his claim, in the exhibition thereof, to the extent that the administrator may be appraised of its amount and origin and thus be enabled to investigate it intelligently and that a recovery upon it may operate as a bar to any other action based upon the same cause. With these purposes accomplished, the court acquires jurisdiction over the demand and, notwithstanding it may be meager and, to some extent, indefinite in statement, if the administrator is satisfied to go to trial upon the merits without first moving to have it made more definite and certain, he waives all such defects and will not be heard to object to them, especially after verdict." Britian v. Fender, 116 Mo. A. 93, 96, 92 SW 179.

"It is nevertheless essential that a claim, however informal, should so specify and identify the transaction out of which it arose as to apprise all concerned of its general nature and character, and the amount claimed, so that it can be properly investigated and defended against if desired." Carter v. Pierce, 114 Ill. A. 589, 592.

[a] Statement of consideration.—Where the claim is founded upon a parol promise, the consideration must be stated with such particularity that the court may determine whether it is legally sufficient. Windell v. Hudson, 102 Ind. 521, 2 NE 303.

[b] Entitling claim.—The statutory provision requiring the statement to be entitled with the name of plaintiff and defendant is directory. Wise v. Outtrim, 139 Iowa 192, 117 NW 264, 130 AmSR 301.

[c] Informal statement with oral explanation.—Where the written statement, although somewhat informal, was accompanied by an oral explanation, it was held sufficient. Hammett v. Starkweather, 47 Conn. 439.

[d] A statement of a definite sum in a claim for services does not preclude a recovery of the reasonable value of the services. White v. Almy, 34 R. I. 29, 82 A 397.

[e] Omission of the dollar sign or the word "dollars" in connection with figures was harmless, where the attached affidavit gave the amount due in dollars and cents. Scott Stamp, etc., Co. v. Leake, 9 Cal. A. 511, 99 P 731.

[f] Note and account.—Where a claim was on a note, the claimant could not recover on stating on account. Keys v. Keys, 217 Mo. 48, 116 SW 537.

[g] A claim for services of a physician need not allege that the physician was licensed to practice. Cooper v. Griffin, 13 Ind. A. 212, 40 NE 710.

[h] Incorrect statement as to basis of claim.—Where plaintiff's claim was made on the basis of a common interest in a business, which was conducted by plaintiff and decedent as partners, and which ceased, and deceased had agreed to account for plaintiff's interest, when a corporation was formed which took over the business and property and issued the stock therefor to deceased, and it appeared that they continued to own the stock in common, an accounting could not be had without a new claim being presented, or at least further evidence as to the business of the corporation being given. White v. Campbell, 143 App. Div. 953, 128 NYS 354.

[i] It is not necessary to allege the evidence on which claimant relies to establish his claim. White v. Almy, 34 R. I. 29, 82 A 397.

pend largely upon the character of each case and more or less particularity of description will be required according to the nature of the claim.[83] The statement must, of course, show that a liability exists

[j] A claim for a specified sum "& int.," allowed by the administrator and approved by the court in similar language, is a claim for the specified sum and interest, the abbreviation standing for the word "interest." Raggio v. Palmtag, 155 Cal. 797, 103 P 312.

[k] The insufficiency of the statement of one or more separate items in a claim does not render the entire claim insufficient. Sheeks v. Fillion, 3 Ind. A. 262, 29 NE 786; Taggart v. Tevanny, 1 Ind. A. 339, 27 NE 511.

[l] Claim not in form of statement of indebtedness.—A notice of claim describing the exact nature and extent of the indebtedness and containing a copy of the notes and judgment on which the claim was based was not defective because it omitted to put the claim in the form of a statement of indebtedness against the estate. Rassieur v. Zimmer, 249 Mo. 175, 155 SW 24.

[m] Immaterial details need not be stated.—Thompson v. Oreña, 134 Cal. 26, 66 P 24.

[n] Claims presented to commissioners.—(1) The principle stated in the text applies to statement of claims presented to commissioners. Mead's App., 46 Conn. 417. (2) On appeal from the commissioners, however, the requirements, under a rule of court in Connecticut (see 58 Conn. 588) are more strict. Merwin's App., 72 Conn. 167, 43 A 1055; Donahue's App., 62 Conn. 370, 26 A 399. (3) Prior to this rule all that was necessary was that the claim should be so stated that it could be understood. Corr's App., 62 Conn. 403, 26 A 478 [foll Tolles' App., 54 Conn. 521, 9 A 402; Mead's App., 46 Conn. 417; American Bd. Foreign Mission Comrs. App., 27 Conn. 344; Mills v. Wildman, 18 Conn. 124].

[o] A motion duly made in the circuit court pursuant to a statute against an administrator to compel him to refund money which had been paid as security for decedent, and an appearance and resistance of the motion by the administrator, was a sufficient presentation. Smith v. Smith, 4 Miss. 216.

[p] Motion for allowance of attorney's fees.—Where no request was made in the probate court for a more definite statement of the services rendered by the attorney of an administrator, and the only objection to his motion for the allowance of his fee was to the introduction of any evidence in the hearing on appeal to the circuit court, a written motion alleging the appointment of the administrator, that the attorney had acted as such from the time of the appointment and performed necessary legal services up to the time of settlement, and praying the allowance of a reasonable attorney's fee, is sufficient. In re Lutz, 175 Mo. A. 427, 162 SW 679.

[q] Express and implied contracts.—The rule that, where the complaint is based upon an implied contract, a recovery cannot be had on an express contract does not apply to a mere statement of a claim filed against a decedent's estate. Masters v. Jones, 158 Ind. 647, 64 NE 213.

[r] Sufficiency of statement should be questioned by demurrer.—Merwin's App., 72 Conn. 167, 43 A 1055.

[s] Variance.—There is no variance because the claim, filed against a decedent's estate on a guaranty of notes, merely described notes as signed by S, and guaranteed by P, deceased, which was correct as far as it went, and the notes, when produced, also showed the names of other indorsers. De Clerque v. Campbell, 231 Ill. 442, 83 NE 224.

[t] A statute establishing uniformity in the use of blanks in the probate court cannot operate to deprive claimant of his remedy because there is no prescribed form adopted to the existing situation. Merrill v. Regan, 117 Me. 182, 103 A 155.

[a] Statements held sufficient.—(1) A claim reading: "To providing a home for and care and support of Lucy S. Hoskins, from the decease of her husband until her death $2,000." Hoskins v. Saunders, 80 Conn. 19, 66 A 785. (2) A statement which recited that decedent "held in trust and converted the sum of $2,000 belonging to" claimant, which amount was set out at the right of the claim, and further recited: "Creditor—Paid on above account, $500; balance, $1,500." Brown v. Stair, 25 Colo. A. 140, 136 P 1003. (3) A statement of a claim for money had and received, setting out the nature of the demand, the dates and amounts of the several sums paid for the use of decedent, and the character of the claim, consisting of deposits in a bank and in a building and loan association as proceeds from a business running through a period of several years. Leimgruber v. Leimgruber, 172 Ind. 370, 86 NE 73, 88 NE 593. (4) A statement of a claim for services rendered, showing the total number of days of service and wages per day, and stating the total sum with amount paid and balance due. Duncan v. Thomas, 81 Cal. 56, 22 P 297. (5) "To services rendered as per contract," between certain dates, "$200." Smith v. Williams, 123 Mo. A. 479, 480, 100 SW 55. (6) A statement "For legal advice and services rendered [deceased] $500." Foster v. Shaffer, 84 Miss. 197, 198, 36 S 243. (7) A statement of a claim for legal services rendered testator in a divorce suit, accompanied by an account, referring to a certain trip and procuring evidence to be used in a suit, and reciting that testator employed claimant to do certain work and agreed to pay her ten thousand dollars. Josephs v. Briant, 108 Ark. 171, 157 SW 136. (8) A statement of claim against an estate for legal services, which stated the general nature of the services, such as renting land, looking after its taxation, giving legal advice, etc. Sandusky v. Courtney, 168 Mo. A. 325, 153 SW 1084. (9) A statement in the following form "Estate of C. C. Brown, deceased, To Gobin Stair, Dr. April, '08. That C. C. Brown held in trust and converted the sum of Two Thousand Dollars belonging to Gobin Stair, $2,000. Credit-Paid on above account $500. Balance, $1,500." Brown v. Stair, 25 Colo. A. 140, 142, 143, 136 P 1003 ("Upon its face, the claim as filed appears to be upon an account of one transaction only, consisting of a single debit of $2,000 for money received by Brown for the use of the claimant and converted to Brown's own use, and a single credit of $500 paid thereon. Although inartistically drawn, it sufficiently states the demand under the statute making formal pleadings unnecessary in such probate matters.—Section 8002, Mills' (1912), R. S., 1908, section 7212. It appears beyond controversy that the executrix knew of the claim. As the facts generally upon which it was based were, and for a long time prior to its filing had been, known to her, she could in no manner have been prejudiced by the form in which it was presented").

[b] Statement held insufficient.—Where a claim due to one of the executors was decribed as "amount due on note signed by deceased in favor of Francis Palmer, $61.93," and the date of the note was not given, and it did not appear whether the amount stated was the face of the note, or the face and interest, or the balance due, the statement was insufficient. In re Palmer, 110 Me. 441, 86 A 919.

[c] A claim upon an unmatured promissory note is sufficient if in the usual form, containing a copy of the note and being followed by the statutory affidavit. Crocker-Woolworth Nat. Bank v. Carle, 133 Cal. 409, 65 P 951; Landis v. Woodman, 126 Cal. 454, 58 P 857.

[d] A notice of the nonpayment of a promissory note, personally served on the executor of an indorser of the note, or which is shown to have come to his hands, although it may come from a notary protesting the note, will be sufficient to withdraw the claim from the operation of the statute of nonclaim, if it describes the note with accuracy, and informs the personal representative who the holder is and that he looks to the representative for payment. Mobile Branch Bank v. Hallett, 12 Ala. 671. See also Walker v. Wigginton, 50 Ala. 579 (construing Rev. Code § 2196 [Code (1896) § 133] which provides for the filing of a claim in the office of the probate judge instead of presentation); Helm v. Smith, 10 Miss. 403 (notice by mail of dishonor).

[e] Where exact amount not ascertainable.—Where the claim arose out of decedent's liability as surety upon the bond of the administrator of another estate, a claim in the following form "To cash due said estate of Marcos Elizalde, deceased, by reason of said Luigi Marre becoming surety on the bond of Ernest Graves as administrator of the estate of said Marcos A. Elizalde, deceased, the sum of $6163.65. Interest on said sum from Aug. 1, 1900, at 7 per cent. per annum $1063.90," was sufficient, although the exact amount of the claim could not be known until determination of a pending suit for an accounting. Elizalde v. Murphy, 163 Cal. 681, 689, 126 P 978 ("It is, of course, apparent that the exact amount due from the estate of Marre could not be stated until this accounting was had. The purpose of presenting a claim is to advise the party against whom the claim is presented of its nature. The Code nowhere defines the precise form of such a claim").

[f] Balance of account.—(1) Unless otherwise required by statute a balance struck in an account between parties may be presented as a claim without specifying the particular items of the account. In re Swain, 67 Cal. 637, 8 P 497 [foll Parker v. Eufaula Nat. Bank, 121 Ala. 516, 25 S 1001 (presentation of a balanced bank book sufficient)]. (2) It is otherwise, however, when such specification is required by statute. Thurmond v. Sanders, 21 Ark. 255; Roethlisberger v. Caspari, 12 Mo. A. 514.

on the part of the estate and in favor of the claimant,[84] and the claim must be exhibited or presented in its entirety; the creditor has no right to divide it into parts and exhibit or present it piecemeal.[85] Where, however, a claimant has several claims arising at different times and growing out of different transactions, he may file separate and distinct claims for each transaction which is separate and distinct from those in other claims.[86] Under some statutes the statement of the claim takes the place of a petition and must be regarded as a statement of the cause of action; hence the cause of action must be sufficiently set forth in the statement filed.[87] The fact that the statement of the claim is for a larger amount than is due does not justify the exclusion of evidence to prove the actual amount of the debt.[88] Where, at the time when a claim was presented to an administrator for allowance, it was not barred by limitations, either actually or apparently, but when the administrator acted upon and rejected it, about a year thereafter, it was barred on its face, the claim not stating intestate's absence from the state for a period which would take the claim out of the statute when rejected, in view of the administrator's delay, he could not claim that the notice of claim was insufficient because it did not show, when acted upon, that it was not barred by limitations.[89] The claim should be filed in the name of the legal or equitable owner,[90] and the name of claimant,[91] as well as the name of decedent,[92] should be accurately stated; but the omission of the name of the personal representative, the statement being made out in the name of the estate of the decedent, is not a fatal defect.[93] So also the fact that a demand is made out against decedent by name instead of against his estate or his personal representative will not justify a refusal to admit evidence to support it.[94] It is usually required that any credits[95] or off-

[g] Inaccuracies not invalidating presentation.—(1) Where H, defendant's intestate, in making his individual note, signed it "H. & Co.," and in making presentment to the administrator it was improperly described as signed by H individually, the presentment was not thereby rendered invalid. Sears v. Howe, 80 Conn. 414, 68 A 983, 12 AnnCas 809. (2) Where claimant presented to the administrator of the deceased debtor a verified claim, and gave the date of the mortgage securing it, without giving the names of the parties thereto, and incorrectly describing one of the parcels of the land mortgaged, but the claim was presented in a sealed envelope containing the original note and mortgage, as the note and mortgage were made a part of the claim, it was sufficiently presented within Code Civ. Proc. § 1497. Raggio v. Palmtag, 155 Cal. 797, 103 P 312.

[h] A claim for "services in the care and aiding and support" of decedent's sister and minor children is broad enough to include aid and support by the contribution of money. Grimm v. Taylor, 96 Mich. 5, 55 NW 447.

[i] Claim for back taxes.—No pleading other than the tax bill need be filed in the probate court on a demand for back personal taxes against the estate of a decedent. State v. Seehorn, 139 Mo. 582, 39 SW 809.

[a] A note which is payable to a third person and which contains nothing to show that the claimant is its holder, either by indorsement, assignment, or delivery, will not support the claim unless the affidavit shows that the claimant has either a legal or equitable interest in the note. [a] Illustration.—The proof of a claim which the statute requires to be tendered to the personal representative should show every fact touching its validity which it would be necessary to aver in a petition, and if it does not, the personal representative should refuse payment. Headley v. Jenkins, 13 KyL 463.

[b] When creditor not a natural person.—Under a statute requiring claims to be entitled in the name of the claimant against the administrator of the estate, as such, with the name of the estate, etc., the claimant need not aver in what capacity, whether as a corporation, partnership, or person, it acted in presenting the claim, unless the pleading is assailed by motion. Chicago Univ. v. Emmert, 108 Iowa 500, 79 NW 285.

[c] Representative need not plead.—A statute providing that creditors shall file statement of their demands in the clerk's office and give notice thereof to the representative does not contemplate that a claim thus filed should stand for a declaration to which the representative should be compelled to plead, and therefore the representative cannot be required against his consent to appear and plead to a claim so filed. [a] Partners.—All the acting resident partners must join in the probate of a claim due the firm, under a statute requiring the "person holding the debt" to make probate, although it seems otherwise as to secret or nonresident partners. Gregory v. Bailey, 4 Del. 256.

[b] A note indorsed in blank may be probated in the name of any one consenting. Whitford v. Herting, 60 Ill. A. 413.

[c] Where a person files a claim as administrator of another estate (1) he does so in his representative capacity and in favor only of the estate named. Barker v. Thompson, 98 Ill. A. 78. (2) Where a statement of a claim is presented by a person who therein describes himself simply as an administrator, without naming the estate which he represents or showing whether the claim is in favor of that estate or of himself personally, the presentation is insufficient. Bibb v. Mitchell, 58 Ala. 657.

[d] Change of ownership after filing.—"One who acquires title in a claim filed against an estate after the date of filing, may prosecute the same in the name of the party filing." Hoopeston Nat. Bank v. Williams, 181 Ill. A. 122, 125 (where a claim filed against an estate by a corporation is afterward transferred to a trustee for the benefit of the stockholders, the trustee may continue the prosecution in the name of the corporation).

91. Cooper v. Griffin, 13 Ind. A. 212, 40 NE 710.

[a] Claimant's christian name must be stated, and a statement merely giving the initials of claimant's name is insufficient. Cooper v. Griffin, 13 Ind. A. 212, 40 NE 710.

[b] Variance; married name of claimant.—There was no variance between a claim which designated claimant, a widow, as "Lizzie Summerhays Craig" and proof that she was known as "Mrs. Ed. Craig" or "Mrs. Edward Craig." Craig v. Craig, 167 Iowa 340, 149 NW 454.

sets[96] existing in favor of decedent or his estate shall be stated.

[§ 987] (c) Production of Original Instrument or Copy. Where the claim is founded on a written instrument, such as a bill or note, it is not necessary to present or file the original instrument, unless the statute expressly so requires, if the claim and the instrument are properly and sufficiently described in the statement presented,[97] and the filing or presentation of a copy of the instrument accompanied by the statutory affidavit is generally held sufficient.[98] The presentation of even a copy of the note or other written instrument on which the claim is based is not necessary unless required by statute, but the presentation is sufficient if the claim or note is properly described.[99] Some statutes, however, expressly require that where the claim is founded upon a written instrument or an account, either the original or a copy must accompany the claim,[1] but such statutes do not apply to cases where the instrument has been lost and no copy can be obtained,[2] or where the instrument is only collaterally involved and is not the basis of the claim;[3] and it has been held that presentation of a copy may be

[a] Claim based on judgment.—Under a statute providing that the manner of exhibiting claims against decedents' estates shall be by filing an exemplification of the record on which the claim is founded, a transcript of the judgment docket of the district court was insufficient. Alvater v. Central City First Nat. Bank, 45 Colo. 528, 103 P 378 (holding also that the filing of a claim was insufficient, where it was based on a judgment that had not been entered).

[a] Where the claim is based on a judgment it is not necessary that a certified copy of the judgment should be presented as part of the claim unless the statute so provides, although it may be the duty of the representative to require evidence or vouchers sufficient to establish to his satisfaction the justice of the claim. In re Crosby, 55 Cal. 574 (prior to Hittel Gen. L. pp 881–884, a claim based on a judgment might properly consist, so far as presentation was concerned, only of a statement of the material parts of the judgment); Gaston v. McKnight, 43 Tex. 619 (an abstract which properly describes the judgment, its date, amount, parties, etc., and which is accompanied by the affidavit of the holder, is sufficient). See also Ransom v. Quarles, 16 Ala. 437 (the certificate of the clerk of the court in which judgment was rendered is sufficient if it substantially describes the judgment, and that the omission to specify the costs is immaterial).

[b] Copy insufficient where original required.—A claim was properly disallowed, where claimant filed only a copy of the receipt evidencing the claim, instead of filing the receipt itself, as required by statute. McMahan v. Foy, 104 Miss. 309, 61 S 421. To same effect In re Hobson, 40 Colo. 332, 91 P 929.

[c] What instrument is foundation of claim.—The instrument of writing on which the claim of the beneficiary under a trust deed for taxes paid on the land against the estate of the mortgagor was founded, within the meaning of Rev. St. (1908) § 7212, was the covenant of the trust deed, which required the mortgagor to pay all costs of the trust, including money advanced for taxes, and not the tax receipts or the secured notes, so that the covenant in the tax deed must be exhibited in probate court. Gilmour v. Central City First Nat. Bank, 21 Colo. 301, 121 P 767.

[d] Mutilated note.—Where the claim is founded on a promissory note which has been mutilated since execution by having the signature torn away and the torn portion lost, the statement of the claim must account for the mutilation and show that the holder is innocent thereof. [a] Illustrations.—(1) Where decedent was surety on a note for plaintiff, and on one occasion plaintiff handed him one half of the amount of the note with a request that it be applied as a partial payment, and decedent stated that he needed the money for his own use and suggested a renewal of the note, which was done, after which plaintiff was compelled to pay the entire note, and on another occasion plaintiff was to borrow money from another with decedent as surety, and the money having been left for plaintiff with decedent, the latter failed to pay it over to plaintiff, plaintiff's cause of action against the estate by virtue of such transactions was in assumpsit for money had and received and not on the notes, and hence he was not required by Rev. St. (1899) § 188, to set out the notes in question in a statement of the claim. Britian v. Fender, 116 Mo. A. 93, 92 SW 179 (a statement of claim averring that decedent's estate was indebted to claimant, as of Nov. 20, 1902, to two hundred dollars paid to decedent to be credited on the note of claimant and decedent, at a certain bank, which decedent failed to do, and on another date, "to money on Frady note," sufficiently showed the nature of the claim). (2) Where a claimant against an administrator had entered into a contract for the sale of ice to a firm of which decedent was a member, had then made a compromise with the firm, and had finally made an oral agreement for the payment of the amount last agreed upon in installments at certain dates, his claim was not based on either of the prior contracts, but on the oral agreement, and hence did not fall within Code Civ. Proc. § 2607, providing that a copy of the instrument on which a claim is founded must accompany the claim. Dorais v. Doll, 33 Mont. 314, 83 P 884.

[b] Claims not based on judgment.—(1) Where guaranteed notes were secured by mortgage, and judgment was rendered against the guarantors in the action to foreclose, and the notes were transferred to the guarantors after payment by them, their claim against the estate of the maker for the amount so paid was founded upon the notes, and not upon the judgment of foreclosure, so that it was not necessary to file the exemplification of the judgment with the claim against the estate. Cone v. Eldridge, 51 Colo. 564, 119 P 616. (2) The claim of the surety on the appeal bond of decedent, who pays the amount due under his obligation on the appeal being dismissed, and files a claim therefor against the estate, with the transcript of the judgment docket, bearing the written assignment to him of the judgment, attached, is not a judgment within Rev. St. (1908) § 7212, requiring in such case the claim to be exhibited by filing an exemplification of the record, the transcript and assignment merely showing for what the advancement was made. German American Trust Co. v. National Surety Co., 55 Colo. 499, 136 P 457.

[c] Notes given to toll the statute

waived by the personal representative.[4] It is sufficient to file or present an original note on which the claim is based, accompanied by the proper affidavit,[5] but as canceled checks disclose no liability at all on the part of the estate to anyone, filing such checks is not sufficient evidence of a claim arising out of the transaction in which they were given.[6]

Assigned instrument. Where a note secured by mortgage given by decedent was assigned to the administratrix, the filing of a copy of the note with the claim was sufficient without a copy of the assignment.[7]

[§ 988] (d) Production of Vouchers.[8] Unless the statute expressly so requires, the creditor need not present vouchers in support of his claim,[9] and if the statute provides that the representative may require satisfactory vouchers, they need not be presented unless the representative makes a request for them.[10] But where vouchers are required, they must conform to the statute.[11] Where a widow, as administratrix of her husband's estate, claimed the right to an allowance for a minor child's share of the cost of supporting the family during administration, she was not required to furnish itemized receipts from other persons for the amount of the child's share; but it was sufficient for her to file a voucher from herself individually to herself as administratrix for the care and support of the infant, provided no objections were made as to the value of such support and maintenance.[12]

[§ 989] (e) Secured Claims. Provision is made by some statutes whereby a statement of a claim which is secured by a mortgage or other lien must describe the same, and, where it has been recorded, refer to the date, volume, and page of the record.[13] Under such a statute merely presenting a copy of a note which states that it is secured by mortgage is not a sufficient presentation of the mortgage,[14] and such presentation has been held to operate as a waiver of the mortgage lien,[15] although this has been denied.[16] But a statute providing that if the claim is secured by mortgage or other evidence of lien, the mortgage, etc., or a certified copy from the record shall be attached to the claim and filed therewith, has been held to be merely directory, it being sufficient if the claim is otherwise sufficiently described in the statement;[17] and the creditor's failure to assert his lien in the affidavit authenticating his claim has been held not to constitute a waiver of the lien.[18] It has been considered proper to present the whole mortgage debt as due on the bond, such a claim amounting to a claim for any deficiency which may remain after the security has been exhausted.[19]

[§ 990] (f) Signature. Although the statute requires "a statement of the claim in writing signed by the creditor," it is sufficient that he signs the affidavit attached to the claim.[20]

6. Lehman v. Powe, 95 Misc. 446, 456, 49 S 622 ("These canceled checks disclose no liability at all on the part of the estate to any one. In fact, they showed no liability from any person to another, and could not have been used as a foundation for a suit in any court. They could have been used, it is true, as evidence in a suit for money loaned, if in fact they related to such a transaction, but only as one link in the evidence necessary to maintain such a suit. Their mere introduction in evidence in such a suit, unaided by other evidence, would not have proven anything. The words 'written evidence,' as used in the statute, clearly mean such a writing as by its terms or on its face evidences the fact that a liability exists on the part of the estate in favor of the claimant. Code 1906, § 2106 is mandatory, and, unless it has been complied with, the administrator, under Code 1906, § 2105, has no authority to pay the claim; nor has the court power to order him so to do, unless Code 1906, § 2106 has been complied with. The allowance of this claim was error. In some of the states, probably in most of them, the statute does not require that claims shall be presented for probate in any particular form; but where the statute does so require, as is the case with us, it must be complied with").

19. Smith v. Wilson, 79 N. J. Eq. 310, 321, 81 A 851 ("The matter I think is made plain by the case of Crater v. Smith, 42 N. J. Eq. 348, 7 A 575 [aff 43 N. J. Eq. 636, 12 A 530]. The practice of presenting under oath the whole mortgage debt as due on the bond is sustained by this case, but what the claim amounts to is not a claim for the whole debt, but merely a claim for the payment of any deficiency which may thereafter be declared due to the claimant after his primary security [the land] has been exhausted. Mr. Justice Van Syckle (43 N. J. Eq. 639, 12 A 531), speaking for the entire court of errors and appeals, discusses the effect of the act of March 12, 1880, as amended in 1881, upon 'bonds and mortgages given for the same indebtedness' by a decedent whose estate was before the court, and he says (at p 639): 'The act of 1881 prohibits suit upon the bond until sale is made under the decree of foreclosure, but does not prevent the creditor from presenting his claim to the administrator under the rule to bar. If not presented within the time so limited, it cannot be presented at all. The object of said act is to compel the mortgagee to look primarily to the mortgaged premises for payment, and to limit the time for suing for deficiency to six months from the date of sale.' In the light of this authoritative exposition of the relation of the mortgage debt in this case, to the land covered by the mortgage and the personal estate of the mortgagor who signed the bond and contracted the debt, what possible ground can there be for holding that the complainants as assignees of the mortgage or as parties subrogated by payment of the mortgage to the mortgagee's rights, can stand in any different position from that which the original mortgagee would occupy upon the death of the mortgagor? The complainants if subrogated merely succeed to certain fixed rights and remedies; they get no further or higher rights; they must therefore exhaust their remedy against the land first, and their proof, if properly made in time, would only entitle them under the statute, within the time limited, to recover any deficiency in case such deficiency remained after the proceeds of the sale of the land had been exhausted").

20. Bankston v. Coopwood, 99 Miss. 511, 514, 55 S 48 ("To sustain his position, the appellee relies on the case of Walker v. Nelson, 87 Miss. 268, 39 S 809. In that case the court

[§ 991] (g) Amendment—aa. In General. Statements of claims are generally subject to amendment, provided that substantial justice will be promoted thereby, that the cause of action embraced in the original statement is not changed, that new items are not added, and of course that the original statement contains allegations upon which an amendment may be predicated, such amendments being allowed either under the general statutes relating to amendments of pleadings or under special statutes applicable to claims of creditors in administration proceedings.[21]

Making more definite and certain. The personal representative to whom a claim is presented has sometimes the right to require the creditor to make the statement of the claim more definite and certain.[22]

[§ 992] bb. Time for Amendment. It has been held that after the time for presenting or filing claims has expired an amendment will not be allowed,[23] at least where it increases the amount of the claim[24] or substitutes a different claim for the same amount;[25] but there is also authority for the view that, where a claim was originally filed in time, an amendment may be allowed after such time has expired,[26] and it has been held that an amendment said: 'The itemized account attempted to be probated against the estate of the decedent was not signed by the creditor, nor was there any affidavit attached thereto.' We have examined the original record in that case, and find that the creditor signed neither the account nor the affidavit attached thereto. That case, therefore, is not authority for the contention here made that a signing of the statutory affidavit attached to the account is not a sufficient signing of the account. Such a contention was not presented to the court, and the language used by the court in that case was addressed to the particular facts of the case. A substantial, and not a literal, compliance with the statute is required. 'A statement of the claim in writing signed by the creditor' is necessary under the statute; but a signing by the creditor of the affidavit is a substantial compliance with this requirement. The affidavit is attached to the account, and is a part of it. The purpose of the statute in requiring the claim to be signed is to identify it and verify its correctness. A signing of the affidavit attached to the claim is necessarily a signing of the claim itself in the sense of the statute. The statute does not point out any particular place where the claim shall be signed").

[a] Illustration. — Where the original claim filed purports to be based on a judgment, and an amended claim, filed against the same estate after the lapse of the two years allowed by statute for the exhibition of claims, is based on a check and money loaned, the statute of limitations does not apply, notwithstanding such amended claim sets up a new cause of action, where it appears by extraneous evidence that the original and amended claims pertained to the same transaction. Carter v. Pierce, 114 Ill. A. 589.

[b] An amendment by substituting the name of the real party in interest may be allowed after the expiration of the time for filing claims. McCall v. Lee, 120 Ill. 261, 11 NE 522.

[c] What amounts to amendment.—Where one having a claim filed an informal claim on May 10, 1905, within the period of limitations, a more formal statement of the claim, filed after the expiration of the period allowed for filing claims, but reciting that the claim was for services performed by claimant, "as stated in her claim filed on the 10th day of May, 1905," could not be regarded as a separate and distinct claim, but was an amendment of the prior statement. Wise v. Outtrim, 139 Iowa 192, 117 NW 264, 130 AmSR 301.

[d] Original claim sufficient to warrant evidence of liability.—Where claims each alleged that decedent's estate was justly indebted to claimant in a specified sum on a note of a third person attached thereto, which, however, did not show that decedent was a party, the claims were nevertheless sufficient, in the absence of demurrer or motion, to justify evidence of decedent's liability, and were therefore amendable after the time for filing claims had expired. Chariton Nat. Bank v. Whicher, 163 Iowa 571, 145 NW 299.

[e] Express and implied contracts.—Where a claim, based on an implied contract was filed within the time allowed by law for presentation of such claims, an amendment of the statement of claim, filed after the expiration of the period of limitation, did not permit the intervention of the defense of limitations, although the amended statement set up the contract as an express one. Wise v. Outtrim, 139 Iowa 192, 117 NW 264, 130 AmSR 301.

[f] Consistency with original statement.—Although a statement of claim was subject to a motion to make more definite, and was demuris allowable on appeal.[27]

[§ 993] cc. Effect of Amendment. Where the time of filing is material, as where it bears on the rank or priority of the claim, an amendment does not deprive claimant of the benefit of his original filing.[28]

[§ 994] (2) Verification[29] — (a) Necessity— aa. In General. It is very generally provided by statute that claims presented or filed shall be verified by an affidavit as to their correctness and justness, and such requirements are usually held to be imperative.[30] It has even been held that the affidavit cannot be waived by the personal representative or dispensed with by the probate court.[31] Under some statutes, however, verification is necessary only when required by the personal representative,[32] and where this is the case, the creditor need not make the affidavit unless the representative requests him to do so,[33] and a want of verification may of course be waived.[34] It has also been held that, while the creditor cannot enforce payment unless his claim is properly verified, if objection is taken on that ground, the representative may pay an unverified claim and be allowed credit for the payment, provided that he knows and can prove that the claim is valid, subsisting, and just,[35] espe-

rable, as showing on its face that the claim was barred by limitations, an amendment of the statement, filed before any motion to make more specific was made, setting up additional matter preventing the application of the bar, was not inconsistent with the original statement. [a] The object of requiring the affidavit of the creditor is not to prove the existence of the debt, as it is not evidence for that purpose, but it is to prevent the exhibition against the estate of claims which are fictitious or which were discharged by the debtor in his lifetime, and also to prevent the allowance of claims against which there exist legal offsets which are known only to the claimant, and which those who are interested in the estate may be unable to establish by legal proof. Williams v. Purdy, 6 Paige (N. Y.) 166.

"The provision of the statute requiring the claims to be presented under oath was intended primarily for the protection of the executor or administrator, and where the estate was solvent the executor could, if he chose, waive this provision and recognize or pay any claim which he knew, or became satisfied was just, without requiring the oath of the creditor." Overly, 1 Metc. (Ky.) 117 (where the personal representative, acting in good faith, has paid an unverified claim, his failure to require an affidavit being a mere oversight, he may subsequently require an affidavit to be made and may thus be entitled to credit for the payment even after an order settling his accounts have been reversed on appeal).

[a] In Mississippi (1) under the earlier statutes the law was as stated in the text. Cheairs v. Cheairs, 81 Miss. 662, 33 S 414, 60 LRA 549; Sims v. Sims, 30 Miss. 333; Smith v. Smith, 4 Miss. 216. (2) But the later statutes expressly forbid the representative to pay unverified claims. Cheairs v. Cheairs, 81 Miss. 662, 33 S 414, 60 LRANS 549.

[b] In New Jersey (1) it was formerly stated that no recognition of a claim by the personal representative or by the probate court could dispense with the requirement that claims be presented under oath and within the statutory period. Lewis v. Champion, 40 N. J. Eq. 959; Gould v. Tingley, 16 N. J. Eq. 501. (2) But it had been decided that, where the estate was solvent, the representative could pay debts which he was satisfied were just, even though the claims were not verified. Kinnan v. Wight, 39 N. J. Eq. 501. (3) It has since been provided by statute that, if the personal representative in good faith pays a claim not presented under oath, and the claim is proved to have been a just one, he shall have allowance for the cially if the claim has been passed by the probate court;[36] and, where an executor who is also residuary legatee gives bond to pay debts and legacies, he may settle and pay claims at his discretion, subject to objections from no one except the sureties on his bond.[37] In the absence of any statute so providing, a claim need not as a rule be verified by the oath or affidavit of the claimant,[38] although in a few states local practice, independent of any express legislative enactment, requires that such claims be supported by affidavit.[39]

Jurisdictional character of requirement. It has been held that verification of the claim is essential to the jurisdiction of the court,[40] and an allowance of a claim which was not accompanied by the required affidavit of its justice, etc., is without force.[41] But there is also authority for the view that such requirement is not jurisdictional,[42] and it has been held that the want of the statutory affidavit may be supplied by the claimant's oath as a witness in open court,[43]

The original affidavit must accompany the claim and it is not sufficient to attach a copy thereof.[44]

An additional affidavit of a person other than the claimant, who states that he believes the claim to be just and gives the reason for his belief, is sometimes required where the demand is other than an obligation signed by decedent or a judgment.[45] But if the executor or administrator is the only competent witness, his refusal to make the affidavit dispenses with further proof, except the claimant's own oath.[46]

It will be presumed on appeal that a claim presented to the court for allowance was properly verified, the record being silent with regard thereto.[47]

[§ 995] bb. What Claims Must Be Verified—(aa) In General. As a general rule all claims and demands against the estate are required to be verified,[48] even though they are not yet due,[49] or an action thereon was pending at the time of decedent's death.[50] The statutes requiring the verification of claims do not, however, apply to demands for which the estate is not directly or properly liable, such as claims arising after decedent's death and on obligations contracted by the personal representative,[51] and it has been considered that contingent or indeterminate claims need not be verified.[52] It has been held that the claim of a bank seeking to enforce its statutory lien on the stock of a deceased debtor need not be accompanied by the statutory affidavit,[53] but an affidavit has been held necessary to authenticate a claim arising out of an alleged breach of trust by decedent.[54]

[§ 996] (bb) Claims Reduced to Judgment. It has been held that unless the statute expressly so provides, a claim based on a judgment need not be verified,[55] and that, where a judgment has been payment if there is sufficient assets to pay the debts of equal degree in full, and that, if the assets are not sufficient, the representative shall be allowed for the pro rata amount which the creditor would have been entitled to receive if the claim had been presented duly verified. Seymour v. Goodwin, 68 N. J. Eq. 189, 59 A 93 [aff 69 N. J. Eq. 833 mem, 66 A 1134 mem (aff 74 N. J. Eq. 856 mem, 72 A 123)]; Freehold First Nat. Bank v. Thompson, 61 N. J. Eq. 188, 48 A 333.

[a] Allowance merely erroneous.—The judgment of a probate court allowing a claim against an estate in the form of a note which is not sworn to is erroneous, but not void for want of jurisdiction, although the statute requires all claims to be sworn to. Gutierrez v. Scholle, 12 N. M. 328, 78 P 50.

[a] Supplying defect by oral oath.—Under the statute allowing claims to be verified either by affidavit or by oath in open court, if a written affidavit is filed from which a requisite fact is omitted, it may be supplied by an oral oath which need not appear of record. Wagoner Undertaking Co. v. Jones, 134 Mo. A. 101, 114 SW 1049.

[a] Affidavits held sufficient.—A claim for services performed at irregular times during several years, so that it was difficult to specify what they were or when they were performed, was sufficiently supported by affidavits stating that the persons making them knew that the claimant performed services for decedent, that they believe his claim was just and correct, giving their reasons, where there was ample evidence that the claimant did perform services for the decedent for which he had not been paid, and for which the decedent intended to pay him, since the claim was of such a nature that no one could positively swear that he knew various items were just and correct. Lancaster v. O'Brien, 136 Ky. 589, 124 SW 854.

[b] Insufficient statement of reason.—An affidavit by an employee of a claimant on an account giving as the only reason for his belief as to the correctness of the account that he had examined complainant's books and found that the account against decedent appeared on the books as on the copy of the account to which his affidavit was attached is insufficient. Crane, etc., Mfg. Co. v. Stagg, 135 Ky. 428, 122 SW 225.

[a] Death pending appeal.—Where judgment is obtained against a party, and pending the appeal he dies, but rendered against an executor or administrator in his representative capacity, the judgment,[56] or duly certified copy thereof,[57] constitutes a sufficient proof or authentication of the claim on which the judgment is founded. But in some jurisdictions a judgment rendered against decedent in his lifetime must be verified in the same manner as other claims.[58]

Foreign judgment. Whatever may be the rule as to a domestic judgment, a judgment allowing a claim against the estate in a foreign administration must, when exhibited against the estate in the domestic administration, be accompanied by the affidavit required by the law of the forum.[59]

[§ 997] (cc) Claims Secured by Mortgage. It has been held that a mortgage is not a "claim for money" within the meaning of a statute specifying the manner in which such claims shall be verified.[60]

[§ 998] (dd) Claims of State or Municipality. It has been held that a statute requiring verification of claims does not, in the absence of an expressed intention, include claims of the state or its agents;[61] but on the other hand it has been held that claims of a municipality for unpaid taxes must be verified by the statutory affidavit,[62] except where the taxes have accrued after decedent's death.[63]

[§ 999] (ee) Claims of Personal Representative. In a number of jurisdictions the statutes require that a claim asserted by the personal representative as a creditor shall be supported by his affidavit to the effect that the claim is justly due and unpaid and that there are no offsets, etc.,[64] and the affidavit must, like the affidavit of any other creditor, substantially conform to the statute.[65]

[§ 1000] (ff) Amended Claims. Where an original statement of a claim is accompanied by the proper affidavit, an amended or additional statement thereafter filed by leave of court need not be supported by another affidavit.[66]

[§ 1001] (b) By Whom Affidavit Made. Ordinarily the affidavit should be made by the creditor himself,[67] or at least by someone having a legal or equitable interest in the claim asserted,[68] and, unless otherwise provided by statute, an affidavit by a third person, such as the creditor's agent, or attorney,[69] or husband,[70] is not sufficient even when based upon his own knowledge.[71] It has also been held that where a third person has paid a debt of decedent and, without showing by independent proof that the payment was made at decedent's request, seeks reimbursement from the estate, his own affidavit in support of his claim is not sufficient but he must obtain the affidavit of the original creditor.[72] The statutes in some states, however, provide that the affidavit may be made by a third person who is acquainted with the facts to be sworn to and who is otherwise competent to testify,[73] or by the agent or attorney of the claimant.[74]

Joint and several claims. It has been held that a joint claim may be sufficiently verified by the affidavit of one of the joint claimants;[75] but it is otherwise where the claim is due to two or more persons severally.[76]

Claim of partnership. It has been held that, the judgment is affirmed and afterward revived against his administrator and certified to the probate court for classification and allowance, the statutory affidavit is not a prerequisite to its allowance in the probate court. Goodrich v. Fritz, 9 Ark. 440.

where the claim is in favor of a partnership, all the acting or managing partners must join in making probate of the claim, and therefore a probate by only one of the members of the firm is insufficient unless it appears that the other members are not active partners.[77]

Assigned claims. It is sometimes required by statute that, where a claim has been assigned after the death of the decedent, both the assignor and the assignee shall join in the verification;[78] but where a claim is properly authenticated when exhibited to the executor, and subsequently it is assigned, it is not necessary that the assignee verify the claim.[79]

A claim of a corporation must necessarily be verified by an agent,[80] and a statute providing that, when the affidavit is made by a person other than the claimant, the reason therefor must be set forth does not apply when the claimant is a corporation and the affidavit is made by an officer thereof.[81] The statutes sometimes require verification by a designated officer or officers,[82] and in such case an affidavit by another officer is insufficient.[83] In the absence of any such statutory designation the affidavit is properly made by that officer or agent who is most familiar with the facts relating to the debt.[84]

The claim of a minor may be authenticated by his next friend.[85]

[§ 1002] (c) Who May Take Affidavit—aa. In General. Under a general statutory authority to take affidavits a clerk of court may take the affidavit required by statute to accompany claims against decedents' estates,[86] and commissioners of deeds appointed by the governor to act in other states have authority to take the affidavits necessary to support claims against decedent's estates.[87] A commissioner of a federal court has no authority to take the affidavit.[88]

[§ 1003] bb. Necessity for Showing Officer's Authority. An affidavit made before a magistrate or other officer of another state must be accompanied by the proper authentication of his official character and authority,[89] but it is otherwise as to commissioners of deeds appointed by the governor to act in other states, as they are officers of the state by whose authority they are appointed, and their official character and authority are matters of which the courts of that state will take judicial notice.[90]

[§ 1004] (d) Form and Sufficiency of Affidavit[91]—aa. In General. The statutes usually either expressly require or clearly contemplate that the oath supporting a claim shall be in the form of an affidavit in writing.[92] The affidavit must show that the demand is a just and subsisting demand,[93] and substantially comply with all the material requirements of the statute,[94] and all the material allegations required by the statute, or their

The administrator of Ethridge is not required to make the affidavit to the claim in controversy, because he was not the assignor; and the distributees are the assignors but were not required to make it because they were not authorized to collect and are not presumed to know what was paid. The statute fails to make any provision for an authentication by an assignor in a case of this kind"). Sask.—In re Mussetter, 1 Sask. L. 369.

[a] Such compliance must appear on the face of the affidavit; a mere statement in the affidavit that af-equivalent, must be incorporated in the affidavit.[95] Under various statutes it has been held necessary that the affidavit should show that the sum claimed is justly due,[96] state that the claim is not usurious,[97] state that there is no offset or discount against the claim,[98] disclose all the credits,[99] state that all legal payments, credits, and offsets have been allowed[1] or that nothing has been paid on the demand except what is credited thereon,[2] show that nothing has been paid, except what is credited,[3] and state that the creditor had not received any security.[4] A substantial compliance with the statute is ordinarily held sufficient, and immaterial errors and omissions or slight departures from the strict statutory form will be disregarded,[5] and hence, although the statute requires that the verified statement filed shall set forth the credits and deductions, if it does not expressly require succinctness and definiteness in stating them, a simple statement of them is sufficient,[6] and may be contained either in the statement of the claim or in the affidavit supporting it.[7] An affidavit is not invalidated by an erroneous statement of a fact not required to be stated,[8] leaving a blank space where the amount of the claim should appear, if such amount can be ascertained from the record as from the commissioner's report on file in the case,[9] or the use of the word "claimant" instead of "affiant," where it appears from the affidavit that the same person is both claimant and affiant.[10] Neither does the fact that the affidavit to a claim in favor of a partnership fails to show that the affiant is a member of the firm render payment of the claim improper, where such person is in fact a member.[11] The statutory affidavit reciting that the claim is "justly due" may properly be used to support a claim which is payable at a future day or which, while absolute in its obligation, is payable upon the happening of some contingency, the word "due" in the affidavit being given the meaning of "owing."[12] A claimant is not required to specify in his affidavit an independent demand which is known

[a] This is necessary although it may appear from an inspection of the claim that it is not usurious. Cudahy Packing Co. v. Miller, 103 Miss. 435, 60 S 574.

[b] The administrator need not pay a judgment based on a usurious note and subsequently sue to recover back the money. Owsley v. Boles, 124 Ky. 775, 99 SW 1157, 30 KyL 1016.

98. Gee Chong Pong v. Harris, (Cal. A.) 175 P 806; Spradlin v. Stanley, 124 Ky. 701, 99 SW 965, 30 KyL 928.

[a] "An affidavit that there is no legal offset or counterclaim against the claim does not comply with the statute. The word 'legal' is not in the statute, and the insertion of this word renders the affidavit only a statement of the belief of the affiant as to the legality of an offset against it. The word 'counterclaim' is not synonymous with 'discount.' 'Discount' is any deduction, while 'counterclaim' is ordinarily used to signify some claim against the debt. If the charges are more than reasonable, or if the consideration of the contract has partly failed, there would be a discount against the claim, although not a counterclaim in the ordinary use of the term." Spradlin v. Stanley, 124 Ky. 701, 703, 99 SW 965, 30 KyL 928.

[b] "Off-set" does not include "discount."—"The plaintiff stated in his affidavit that his account against the decedent 'was just and due him, and was wholly unpaid, and there was no just off-set against the same known to him, and there was no usury contained therein.' In addition to the statement contained in this affidavit, the statute requires the claimant to state that there is 'no discount against the demand.' . . . Unless, therefore, the term set-off is sufficiently comprehensive to embrace discounts as well as set-offs, or unless the affidavit which was made contains some other expression which necessarily excludes the idea of the existence of any discount against the debt, it cannot be regarded as being sufficient." Trabue v. Harris, 1 Metc. (Ky.) 597, 598.

2. Eddy v. Loyd, 90 Ark. 340, 119 SW 264.

[a] Sufficient affidavit.—An affidavit declaring that the account is "just and true," and that the amount named "is justly due after all just credits have been given," is sufficient, under Kirby Dig. § 114, providing that the affidavit shall state that nothing has been paid on the demand, except what is credited thereon, and that the sum demanded is due. Eddy v. Loyd, 90 Ark. 340, 119 SW 264.

3. Hayden v. Hayden, 105 Ark. 95, 150 SW 415; Richards v. Blaisdell, 12 Cal. A. 101, 106 P 732.

[a] Insufficient affidavit. — Under the statute requiring the affidavit to state that the amount is justly due, that no payments have been made thereon which are not credited, and that there are no offsets to it to the knowledge of affiant, an affidavit that the claim is due and unpaid, and that there are no offsets against it and no credits thereon, is insufficient. to the personal representative and which is conceded to be due from claimant to the estate, but which the administrator may or may not plead as a counterclaim at his option.[13] Irregularities in the affidavit may be waived by the representative's failure to make seasonable and specific objections thereto,[14] and after approval and allowance of the claim the affidavit cannot be impeached, except in a direct proceeding.[15]

The fact that the claimant is a relative of decedent does not necessitate a stronger verification of his claim than is required of any other creditor.[16]

An affidavit made in the debtor's lifetime is clearly insufficient.[17]

A mistake in the name of decedent will, as in the statement of a claim, render the affidavit defective.[18]

[§ 1005] bb. Showing Knowledge of Affiant.[19] Where the statute requires the affidavit to be made by claimant or some other person who knows that the claim is correct and that it is due, the affidavit must be made upon the affiant's knowledge, and if made "to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief" it is not sufficient.[20] But it has been held that the affidavit need not expressly show that the affiant speaks from his own knowledge, or show the source of his knowledge.[21]

[§ 1006] cc. Affidavit by Person Other than Claimant. It has been held that an affidavit by the agent or attorney of claimant need not show on its face the fact that the affiant is acting as agent or attorney,[22] if this fact is known to the personal representative,[23] although it is, of course, otherwise if the statute requires this fact to be disclosed.[24] Some of the statutes allowing the affidavit to be made by a person other than claimant require that such an affidavit shall set forth the reason why it is not made by claimant himself,[25] and shall state that the affiant is cognizant of the facts contained therein,[26] but in the absence of the latter requirement the fact of the affiant's knowledge or means of knowledge need not be recited in the affidavit but may be shown by evidence aliunde.[27]

[§ 1007] dd. Signature. Unless the statute or a rule of court requires the affidavit to be signed by the affiant, an affidavit otherwise sufficient is not rendered invalid by the omission of the affiant's signature;[28] but where the statute requires the affidavit to be signed by the party making it, the signature of the affiant is essential to the validity of the presentation.[29]

[§ 1008] ee. Amendment. It is usually considered that a defect in an affidavit supporting a claim may be cured by amendment[30] before the expiration of the time for the presentation and verification of claims.[31] But a defective affidavit cannot be amended under a statute not enacted until the period for filing or presenting claims has expired,[32] and where a claim has not been probated in the manner required by law, so that its registration does not stop the running of the statute, the probation cannot be amended on an application made after the claim is barred by limitations.[33]

[§ 1009] (e) Effect of Verification. A proper affidavit of verification entitles the claim to be allowed without further proof if no exception is taken.[34]

[§ 1010] 11. Evidence as to Presentation[35]— a. Presumptions and Burden of Proof. It has been held that the burden of proving a presentation is upon claimant,[36] but other cases assert that in the absence of proof of the time when a claim was presented against an estate, and of any objection in the probate court that it was not presented within the time limited, it must be presumed that it was presented in due time.[37]

[§ 1011] b. Admissions or Part Payment by Representative.[38] Where the personal representative admits or acknowledges that a claim has been duly presented, his admission or acknowledgment is competent evidence of the fact,[39] whether he made it before or after the expiration of the statutory period for presentation, if he was then the acting personal representative,[40] and the competency of this evidence is not impaired by his subsequent resignation.[41] But it has been held that, where an administrator makes a report of insolvency, founded on his knowledge of claims, the report does not indicate that a claim included therein has been duly presented, although on the basis of this report the estate is declared insolvent.[42] A part payment made by the representative after the expiration of the period limited for presenting claims is a fact tending to show that the claim was duly presented.[43]

[§ 1012] c. Request for Indulgence. The fact that an executor or administrator, when shown an execution against his decedent, applied for an indulgence, sufficiently shows a presentation of the claim.[44]

[§ 1013] d. Rejection of Claim. The rejection of a claim is not admissible to prove that it was presented unless there is proof of the signature of the representative to the rejection.[45]

[§ 1014] e. Judgment against Representative. A judgment recovered against an executor or administrator is, as against the heirs or devisees, in a suit to subject land to the payment of the judgment, evidence of the presentation of the claim on which the judgment was recovered.[46]

[§ 1015] f. Best and Secondary Evidence.[47] Where the fact of due presentation or filing of a claim is a matter properly appearing of record in the probate court, the record is the appropriate medium of proof under the best evidence rule, and unless the record evidence is produced or its absence explained, parol evidence is not admissible.[48]

[§ 1016] g. Weight and Sufficiency of Evidence.[49] The sufficiency of the evidence to establish the due presentation of a claim is a matter for determination by the jury, in cases tried before a jury,[50] and in other cases for the court trying the facts.[51] An indorsement on an instrument on which the claim is founded to the effect that the claim was presented to the personal representative at a certain date which was within the statutory period, it being shown that claimant was the sole owner of the instrument, has been held sufficient evidence of presentation.[52] Where defendants claim the benefit of the statute of nonclaim by way of plea, but do not positively deny in their answer the presentation of complainant's demand, proof of presentation by one witness is sufficient.[53]

[§ 1017] 12. Withdrawal of Claim. Where the statute provides that a claim may be presented by filing it or a statement thereof in the office of the judge of probate, the claim or statement filed must remain on file during the rest of the statutory period, and if the creditor after filing the claim withdraws it, and does not leave in its place a proper statement or restore the claim to the files, his act operates as an abandonment of the presentation, as otherwise the personal representative might be misled or deceived;[54] but the withdrawal of the statement of a claim for a mere temporary purpose and under such circumstances that no inference of an intention to abandon the claim can arise does not affect the rights acquired by the creditor through the presentation or filing.[55] Where the claim presented is the result of a compromise agreement with the representative, which is afterward repudiated by him, the creditor may withdraw the claim and substitute another for the amount justly due, although the latter claim is for a greater amount than the former.[56]

[§ 1018] 13. Effect of Presentation—a. In General. The presentation of a claim against a decedent's estate amounts to a demand for payment,[57] and vests the court with jurisdiction thereof,[58] and it has been considered that, where the claim has been filed and entered on the docket it is the commencement of an action.[59] But the mere presentation does not in and of itself, establish the validity of the claim,[60] although it has been held that, where the personal representative does not dispute a claim presented, or offer to refer it, the claim acquires the character of a liquidated debt,[61] and where administrators have collected the assets and filed a petition for the settlement of their accounts, the fund in their hands becomes a trust fund for the benefit of creditors, whose claims were presented to the administrators in due time, and were not disputed, and such claims do not afterward become barred by lapse of time.[62] Proof of a claim while the estate is in the hands of a collector acting as administrator pendente lite, will operate to suspend the running of the statute of limitations against the claim;[63] and it has been held that a claimant's exhibition of his claim to the administrator and presentation thereof to the probate court, although he later dismissed that action and commenced another, was sufficient to destroy the effect of a short statute of limitation.[64] The presentation of a claim is not an election to rely solely upon the liability of the estate, so as to preclude claimant from resorting to other remedies,[65] nor is claimant limited in his right to recover to the particular grounds stated.[66] Neither can the presentation of one claim deprive claimant of the right subsequently to present another and different claim.[67] Where a guardian converted funds of his

57. Stapp v. Messeke, 94 Ind. 423.

58. De Clerque v. Campbell, 125 Ill. A. 357.

[a] Duration of jurisdiction. — The filing of a claim on the adjustment day fixed by the administrator, and having judgment entered on it, stops the running of the statute; and the jurisdiction of the court, with such status of the claim as to the statute, continues till a final order disposing of the cause is made, notwithstanding the subsequent setting aside of such judgment, and an appeal from the order setting it aside, void because such order was merely interlocutory, and this although no special orders of continuance from time to time were entered. De Clerque v. Campbell, 231 Ill. 442, 83 NE 224.

[b] A failure to continue the hearing upon the claim from term to term does not deprive the court of such jurisdiction; the only effect of such failure is to require claimant to give the administrator notice of the hearing upon the claim. De Clerque v. Campbell, 125 Ill. A. 357.

59. Taggart v. Tevanny, 1 Ind. A. 339, 27 NE 511; Agnew's Est., 24 Pa. Co. 327, 7 LackLegN 33.

"The demand of one's legal rights in the orphans' court, according to the form of procedure in that court, is the equivalent of the issuing of a summons in the common pleas. It is not essential in either court that the claim be reduced to final judgment within six years. . . . When the presentation of a claim to an auditor is accompanied by proof and adjudicated favorably by an auditor within six years, which is adjudicated by the orphans' court after the lapsing of the six years, it cannot properly be said that the claimant has not made a lawful demand of his right within six years." Agnew's Est., 24 Pa. Co. 327, 334, 7 LackLegN 33 (where the auditor to whom the claim was presented died without making a report).

In re Whitehead, 38 App. Div. 319, 321, 56 NYS 989 ("The mere presentation to the executors of a claim, with silence on the part of the executors in respect thereto, does not render the claim an established one so as to give to the surrogate jurisdiction to decree its payment on a settlement of the executors' accounts"). See also In re Callahan, 152 N. Y. 320, 326, 46 NE 486 ("We are of opinion that mere silence on the part of an executor or administrator after a presentation of a claim under the statute, accompanied by lapse of time, will not in any case preclude the representative from thereafter contesting its validity. . . . It is a fund in court to be disposed of under the court's decree, just as if the money had been deposited in a court depository awaiting the ordinary course of judicial proceedings or the happening of some future event. I take it that the claims of creditors can no more suffer the allegation or charge of being presumed to be paid than can the next of kin be charged at the instance of the accountants with having received and been paid their share or interest in the decedent's estate. It would not lie in the mouth of the administrators to plead the Statute of Limitations as against the next of kin until they had in some way repudiated their liability to account. [a] Illustrations.—(1) The presentation of a claim for services rendered decedent does not preclude the right to claim certain drafts as a gift causa mortis from him; and the failure to prosecute the claim for services does not deprive the donee of setting up, as a defense to an action by the administrator to recover the drafts, that they were her property by virtue of such gift. Edwards v. Wagner, 121 Cal. 376, 53 P 821. (2) Where, in an action for conversion of money, it appeared that plaintiff had given it to his wife to keep, and that she died with it in her possession; and that plaintiff presented a claim against her estate, of which defendant was executor, who refused to recognize or pay it, the bare presentation of the claim to the executor was no election to rely on it as a claim against the estate, and not against defendant individually for the alleged tort of converting such money. Hunnicutt v. Higginbotham, 138 Ala. 472, 35 S 469, 100 AmSR 45.

[b] Vendor's lien not waived. — The filing and allowance of a claim generally against the estate of a deceased purchaser for the balance of the purchase price of land do not constitute a waiver by a vendor of his right to a vendor's lien therefor, under Civ. Code § 3046, which provides that one who sells real property has a vendor's lien thereon, independent of possession, for so much of the price as remains unpaid and unsecured otherwise than by the personal obligation of the buyer. Selna v. Selna, 125 Cal. 357, 58 P 16, 73 AmSR 47.

wards and died without having accounted therefor, the fact that the wards presented their claims for allowance to the guardian's executors before bringing action thereon did not affect their right of recovery, although it changed their remedy.[68]

[§ 1019] b. Defective Presentation. A defective presentation of a claim does not estop claimant from again presenting it, in due form, within the time allowed.[69] A second presentation of a claim may be treated as an amendment.[70]

[§ 1020] 14. Effect of Failure to Make Due Presentation[71]—a. In General. As a general rule a claim not presented within the statutory period is, as between the creditor and the estate, forever barred and extinguished both as to the remedy and as to the right.[72] But under some statutes the failure to present a claim within the statutory period does not of itself absolutely bar the claim, but precludes the creditor from participating in the inventoried assets of the estate and confines him to tablish a claim for services performed as a professional nurse for decedent, it appeared that she had presented a claim against the estate for cash advanced, that the claim was allowed, and that she signed a receipt reciting that it was in full of all claims against the estate. Her affidavit in support of the claim for cash advanced stated that the account presented embraced all items of expense due her. Claimant claimed that the administrator desired to reimburse her for the moneys which she had advanced, and that she made a bill for that purpose, and did not observe that the receipt covered anything further. It was held that the facts shown authorized a finding that she did not intend to present a claim for anything except the money that she had paid out, and she was not thereby foreclosed from thereafter presenting a bill for her personal services. [c] This is true, although the claim was based on the fraudulent representations of decedent. Planters' Mut. Ins. Assoc. v. Nelson, 80 Ark. 103, 96 SW 123.

[d] "So absolute is the bar of such an one from participation in the assets of the estate that even when all the creditors who have presented and established their claims in the probate court have been paid in full, and a surplus remains in the hands of the administrator for distribution to the next of kin, not only will the probate court not entertain his claim, but no other court can give him such relief." Cowan v. Mueller, 176 Mo. 192, 197, 75 SW 606.

[e] The county court has no power or authority to allow the claim of an administrator against the estate, where the claim was not presented to the county judge for allowance before it was barred by limitations. Farrow v. Nevin, 44 Or. 496, 75 P 711.

[f] It is error to order payment of a claim which has not been duly presented. Lehman v. Powe, 95 Miss. 446, 49 S 622.

[g] When statute may be interposed.—A plea of nonclaim may be filed by an administratrix in the circuit court on review by certiorari of a default judgment against her in a justice court. Merritt v. Vincent Mercantile Co., 157 Ala. 576, 47 S 731.

[h] A testamentary direction for payment of debts does not require payment of a claim not presented at the proper time. Kaufman v. Redwine, 97 Ark. 546, 649, 134 SW 1193 ("The direction in the will for the executor to pay all just debts does not mean that he should pay them without probate. There is nothing in the will to indicate that the testator intended that his estate should be administered in any other than the regular way under the statute, which requires 'all demands against the estates of deceased persons,' 'all such demands as may be exhibited,' etc. The statute provides the very means for ascertaining whether the claims against the estate are just debts").

uninventoried assets afterward discovered,[73] while under others the creditor who has not duly presented his claim is merely postponed to creditors whose claims have been duly presented, and if assets have been paid out he can obtain payment only out of the residue, if any,[74] or if the estate has been distributed he loses his remedy against the personal representative and can look only to the property in the hands of the distributees.[75] Where a claim has not been presented within the statutory period, it cannot thereafter be allowed either in a court of original jurisdiction[76] or on appeal,[77] unless a special statute grants relief from the consequences of the delay and the remedy provided has been duly taken.[78] The creditor's failure to present his demand within the time prescribed by the statute has been held to prevent him from compelling legatees to refund if sufficient assets to pay the claim were retained by the executor,[79] and this although the assets retained have subsequently been wasted or have become unavailable and the executor is insolvent.[80] Where the delay of a creditor in presenting his claim does not defeat but merely defers his right to payment, he is still entitled to require of the personal representative a proper administration of the estate,[81] and to contest the settlement of the representative's accounts.[82] The fact that a claim based upon a bond was not presented within the required time has been held to be no evidence that the execution of the bond was procured through fraud or mistake.[83]

Where a claim is secured, failure to present it affects merely the right of the creditor who resorts to the general assets, and does not deprive him of the right to enforce his security,[84] unless the statute provides otherwise.[85]

[§ 1021] b. Who May Take Advantage of Failure to Present. The failure of a creditor to present his claim may be taken advantage of not only by the executor or administrator, but also by the heirs,[86] or devisees[87] or even by other creditors.[88]

[§ 1022] c. Excuses and Relief[89]—(1) In General. It may be stated broadly that, according to the weight of authority, a creditor cannot be excused for failure to present his claim regardless of the reasons therefor, and cannot be relieved of the consequences of his neglect, unless he is granted indulgence by virtue of some statutory provision.[90]

[i] Judgment. — Where a judgment was recovered in 1893 and the judgment debtor died in 1897 and no claim was presented against his estate, the judgment could not be enforced in 1912, as the judgment lien expired in 1903, and the claim based on the judgment was barred by failure to present it within the statutory period after decedent's death. James v. Weisman, 161 Iowa 488, 143 NW 428.

[j] Creditor without notice of action to settle estate.—Where a creditor failed to file her claim against a decedent's estate, although she had no actual notice of an action to settle it, in which judgment was rendered, and the entire estate distributed to participating creditors, she could not thereafter compel contribution from such creditors. Hill v. Mayes, 117 Ky. 877, 79 SW 276, 25 KyL 2023.

[k] Sureties on an administrator's bond were in no way liable to a creditor who failed to present his claim on account of a devastavit by the administrator, although the creditor recovered a judgment on the claim against the administrator. Gookin v. Sanborn, 3 N. H. 491.

[l] Subrogation. — A creditor of an estate who has failed to present his claim is not subrogated to the rights of a surety under a mortgage given by decedent for his indemnity. Watson v. Rose, 51 Ala. 292.

[m] The repeal of a statute barring claims not presented prevents the claim from being barred where the time for presentation had not expired at the time of the repeal. Ryans v. Boogher, 169 Mo. 673, 69 SW 1048.

[n] A claim for trust funds in the hands of decedent is not within the rule. Walker v. Crews, 73 Ala. 412.

[o] Lapse of time in absence of statute.—The lapse of time without presentation of claims "may raise a strong inference that there are no debts; but, in the absence of a statute of limitations, there is no such conclusive presumption." [a] Illustrations.—(1) The fact that a creditor directs its traveling collector to look after a claim in a certain county after the debtor's death, and that the collector reports on other claims, but not on that one, does not entitle the creditor to file the claim against the debtor's estate after its bar by limitations. Hawkeye Ins. Co. v. Lisker, 122 Iowa 341, 98 NW 127. (2) Where a claim was based on a note secured by mortgage, no recovery could be had thereon against the estate after plaintiff's failure to file the same within the time limited, on the theory that decedent had fraudulently obtained and recorded a release of the mortgage, such fraud being material to show only that the mortgage was a valid and subsisting lien. Franklin v. Killilea, 126 Wis. 88, 104 NW 993. (3) An administrator who has distributed the assets will not be surcharged with a claim of a physician who had attended decedent, where the physician knew of decedent's death, and the probate of her will, but made no claim on the administrator until two years had elapsed after the taking out of letters and proper publication of notice thereof. Barrett's Est., 54 Pa. Super. 124. (4) Where an administrator not only gave the notices required by law, but went to a creditor personally and told him of his appointment and that, in order for the creditor to have his judgment adjusted, it was necessary to present the same as a claim against the estate, the administrator was not guilty of any act inducing the creditor not to present his claim within the time required by law. Meikle v. Cloquet, 44 Wash. 513, 87 P 841.

[b] Relief cannot be granted because of: (1) The creditor's ignorance of the debtor's death. Beekman v. Richardson, 150 Mo. 430, 51 SW 689. (2) The creditor's ignorance of the requirement of presentation and misleading conduct of the representative. Cockrell v. Seasongood, (Miss.) 33 S 77. (3) The death of the creditor after the death of the debtor. Morrow v. Barker, 119 Cal. 65, 51 P 12. (4) The fact that the creditor expected to receive as a legacy under decedent's will a greater sum than the amount of his claim. Gordon v. Ballentine, 50 Ala. 99. (5) The absence of the executor from the place appointed for the presentation of claims. Metz v. Peo., 6 Colo. A. 57, 40 P 51. (6) The pendency of an appeal from the probate of the will. Cone v. Dunham, 59 Conn. 145, 20 A 311, 8 LRA 647. (7) The fact that the probate of the will is subsequently set aside. Delaplane v. Smith, 38 Oh. St. 413. (9) The representative's promise to pay when sufficient assets are received. Pike v. Thorp, 44 Conn. 450; Mosher v. Goodale, 129 Iowa 719, 106 NW 195; Lewis v. Champion, 40 N. J. Eq. 59.

[c] A previous professional engagement of the creditor's attorneys does not constitute an excuse for failure to present or file his claim within the statutory period. Roberts v. Spencer, 112 Ind. 85, 13 NE 129.

[d] Refusal of attorney to act.—Where a judgment creditor who was entitled to file his judgment as a claim against an intestate's estate requested the administrator's attorney to look after the renewal and collection of such judgment, and the attorney promptly notified the creditor that he was employed by the administrator and could not act for the creditor, the attorney was not derelict in failing to inform the creditor concerning his rights in the premises so as to excuse presentment of his claim. Meikle v. Cloquet, 44 Wash. 513, 87 P 841.

[e] The failure of an executor to comply with the request of a claimant to present a claim founded on a note delivered to the executor is no excuse for the claimant's failure to file his claim. In re Hobson, 40 Colo. 332, 91 P 929.

[f] Filing claim with guardian.—Where a claimant failed to file his claim within a year after notice of the administrator's appointment had been given, the fact that the claim had been filed with decedent's guardian prior to his death did not excuse the creditor's delay. Bentley v. Starr, 123 Iowa 657, 99 NW 555.

[g] Representations of administrator before appointment.—(1) An administrator de bonis non is not estopped from urging the bar of the statute of limitations against a claim because of his representation to the claimant, made before his appointment, that there was ample time for the presentation of such a claim. Hallgren v. Utt, 155 Ill. A. 640. (2) Neither is a failure to present the claim excused by reason of a promise of the administrator, before his appointment to pay the claim. Bambrick v. Bambrick, 157 Mo. 423, 58 SW 8.

[h] Relief in equity.—In the absence of statutory authority a court of equity will not interpose to grant relief to a creditor whose claim is barred by his neglect to comply with the statute of nonclaim. Ont.—Millichamp v. Toronto Gen. Trusts Corp., 3 OntWR 375.

"It has long been the practice of the Court to allow creditors who, either by inadvertence, or relying upon their securities, fail to come in and prove their claims within the time limited by the notice to creditors, to come in at any time while the funds of the estate are in Court, and establish their claims as creditors of the estate: Lashley v. Hogg, 11 Ves. Jr. 602, 32 Reprint 1222. And over a century and a half ago the Court of Chancery, in Ex p. Stiles, 1 Atk. 208, 26 Reprint 135, prescribed the conditions upon which that relief may be obtained, which, with one exception, have been recognized ever since. In that case Lord Chancellor Hardwicke said: 'Upon the common equity of this Court, if creditors will make an affidavit that they have not read the Gazette, they will be admitted, so as not to disturb the former dividend, and by that means must, in the first place, be brought up equal to the creditors under the former dividend, before the commissioners (now assignees) can proceed to make a second.' The only case in which this rule seems to have been modified (if accurately reported) was Ex p. Long, 2 Bro. Ch. 50, 29 Reprint 26, where Lord Chancellor Thurlow held that when creditors who had not received a former dividend were allowed to come in and prove their debts, they should only be allowed future dividends pari passu with the other creditors. But Lord Redesdale, L. C. of Ireland, in Re Wheeler, 1 Sch. & Lef. 242, said: 'I have observed a practice here different from that in England; that when a creditor comes forward to prove after a dividend has been made, he is not allowed any benefit of that dividend, but is only admitted to receive his share of the future dividends. I do not think this is warranted by the statute. It may be that a creditor has kept back from some fraudulent intent, or with a view to delay the proceedings; in such a case the practice may be proper. But where everything on the part of the creditor has been fair, and the delay has been occasioned by accident, or unavoidable circumstances (as, for instance, in the case of a foreign creditor who cannot have received notice in time), the commissioners (now assignees) ought to apply the fund in the first place to put such creditor on a footing with the others. If the effects are not sufficient for that, the other creditors can have no further dividend; if there be enough, all must take alike in the future dividend.' And in a note, the reporter adds: 'It is now the constant practice to permit creditors, without an order, to proceed after a dividend and in the first place to direct them to be paid equal to those who had proved before, and then to direct a general distribution of the residue. Lord Redesdale, in conformity with this, reformed a practice which had prevailed in Ireland to the contrary.' Without reviewing intermediate cases, it will be sufficient to refer to In re McMurdo, [1902] 2 Ch. 684, as laying down the general principles upon which the Court allows creditors to come in and prove their claims after the time limited for them to prove has expired." Millichamp v. Toronto Gen. Trusts Corp., supra.

[a] Illustrations.—(1) Where presentation was prevented by fraudulent concealment by decedent, a bill in equity may be maintained to obtain satisfaction out of the surplus in the hands of heirs and distributees, if commenced properly after discovery of claim. Sugar River Bank v. Fairbank, 49 N. H. 131. (2) Where an apparently just claim is left unproved by what appears to be mere inadvertence, a further opportunity may be afforded to make the proof, unless there appears to be some sufficient reason to the entation of claims of creditors against the estates of decedents,[92] or to allow presentation after the expiration of such time.[93]

[§ 1024] (b) Who May Seek Relief. A creditor whose claim has been presented to the commissioners without his authority and has been disallowed is still a creditor who has failed to present his claim so as to bring him within a statute authorizing an extension of time for such creditors and the renewal of the commission on application of such a creditor.[94]

[§ 1025] (c) Time for Seeking Relief. Some of the statutes provide that extensions shall not be granted after a certain period from the expiration of the time originally limited for presenting claims;[95] but it is not ordinarily necessary that the petition for the extension should allege that it is filed within the time allowed.[96]

[§ 1026] (d) Payment of Costs as Condition of Relief. A statute authorizing the opening of an estate to allow a claim to be filed, provided all costs and charges in the probate court shall be paid by contrary. Finegan's Succ., 135 La. 473, 65 S 614. (3) An executor who, by resisting the reference of a settlement suit to the commissioner by showing the unprepared condition of the estate to pay claims, and by assuring the claimant of the full payment of his demands, and requesting him not to sue, induces a claimant to delay the filing of his claims for more than a year from the executor's qualification is estopped to assert the failure of the claimant to file his claims with the commissioner, or to demand payment from the executor within the year specified, as a ground of forfeiture of his right to interest. But where the court recognizes that a publication already made gives notice, although in the opinion of the judge not the best notice, the judge cannot, after the expiration of the time for presentation, extend that time by ordering additional notice, but will be compelled to sign an order or decree showing that due notice to creditors has been given. Ryan v. Lyon, 212 Mass. 416, 99 NE 169.

the claimant, does not require the payment of costs on appeal to the circuit court.[97]

[§ 1027] (e) Proceedings—aa. In General. The special proceedings pointed out by the statute for extending the time must be duly taken or a claim not presented within the regular period cannot be allowed.[98] A federal court has jurisdiction to entertain a suit in equity to permit the presentation of, and allow a claim for, good cause shown, after the time limited by the order of the probate court but within the time allowed by the statute.[99] Under some of the statutes the personal representative and other persons interested have the right to appear and contest the application for the reopening or revivor of the commission and for the extension of the time of presentation,[1] but unless otherwise provided by statute it is not necessary to give notice to the personal representative before granting an order of extension.[2] A creditor who seeks relief from his default in the matter of presenting his claim must show a claim of apparent merit,[3] and present a good reason for relieving him from the consequences of his apparent neglect;[4] and in passing upon the application the court should consider all the attendant circumstances, including the conduct of the creditor and the condition of the estate,[5] and the diligence of the creditor not only in endeavoring to present his claim within the statutory period but also in applying for the extension.[6] The same strictness of proof is not required as when application is made for relief from a default in a civil action,[7] and an extension of time may even be granted on a verified petition showing good cause therefor without hearing extrinsic evi-

[a] Delay precluding relief.—A claim should not be allowed to be filed where it is not presented until more than eight months after the expiration of the time fixed by an order of the court for that purpose, in the absence of a showing of diligence and unavoidable mistake or accident or of fraud warranting the interposition of a court of equity. Nebraska Wesleyan Univ. v. Bowen, 73 Nebr. 598, 103 NW 275.

[b] Circumstances showing negligence.—Where a creditor had general knowledge of transactions of deceased as general manager of the business in which he was interested, and had access to the debtor's books from August to November before his action at law against decedent's estate was barred, he was chargeable with culpable negligence in not prosecuting his claim within the time limited by statute, unless he had been misled by fraud, or had relied on an agreement with the administrator. Holway v. Ames, 100 Me. 208, 60 A 897.

[c] Culpable neglect within the meaning of the statute requiring the creditor to be free therefrom is a culpable want of watchfulness and diligence and unreasonable inattention. Holway v. Ames, 100 Me. 208, 60 A 897.

dence in support of the petition.[8]

[§ 1028] bb. Discretion of Court. Under some statutes the right of a belated claimant is absolute,[9] but the more general rule is that whether relief shall be granted is a matter resting in the discretion of the court,[10] which will not be disturbed unless abused.[11] The courts are, however, liberal in relieving claimants from defaults of this kind,[12] especially where no injury can result to innocent parties,[13] and where good cause is shown for the exercise of this power relief should be granted,[14] and a refusal of the court of first instance to grant relief is properly reversed on appeal.[15]

[§ 1029] cc. Review. An order of a court of probate jurisdiction, denying to a creditor who has not duly presented or filed his claim the relief permitted by the local statutes, is generally held to be a final order from which an appeal may be taken.[16] But on the other hand an order of a probate judge reviving a commission on claims for the purpose of considering the claim of a creditor who had once before secured such an order for the consideration of a different claim has been held not appealable,[17] and it has been considered that a decision on appeal in an intermediate court affirming an order which extends a commission on claims and directs the commissioners to hear and adjudicate upon a specified claim is not a judgment or final order according to the course of the common law, and therefore cannot be reviewed on writ of error.[18] It has also been held that, where the court grants an extension and allows the claim of the creditor, the adjudication as to the extension may be reviewed on appeal from the order allowing the claim.[19]

Judgment on appeal. A judgment of the district court upon an appeal from a refusal of an extension, remanding the cause to the county court, with direction to "permit the filing of the claim, and to set a day for hearing, and to proceed and hear and pass upon the same," is not the proper judgment, but a hearing in the district court on such claim should be had in the same manner as though the appeal had been from an order disallowing the claim upon hearing before the county court.[20]

[§ 1030] (f) Vacating Acceptance of Commissioner's Report. Where an order extending the time for exhibiting claims to the commissioner has been granted after an order accepting the commissioner's first report, the probate court can vacate the order of acceptance.[21]

[§ 1031] (g) Effect of Failure of Revived Commission to Act. Where a commission on claims has been revived, the failure of the commissioners to

17. Bresler v. Wayne Prob. Judge, 152 Mich. 167, 168, 115 NW 960 ("That an order based upon a creditor's first application is not appealable was, in effect, determined by this court in Heavenrich v. Nichols, 113 Mich. 508, 71 NW 852. In Hart v. Shiawassee Cir. Judge, 56 Mich. 592, 23 NW 326, it was held that a creditor who had not presented his entire claim to commissioners might, upon discovering the fact after the allowance by the commissioners, have the commission revived for the presentation of the balance of his claim, as a matter of right. 'The right of the creditor who has failed to present his claim in such case, and have it heard before a revived commission or before the judge of probate, any time before the estate is closed, is given by the statute, and the probate court has no discretionary power to deprive him of it.' There is no distinction in principle between an application to revive a commission to hear a part of a claim, which might, if known, have been presented to the original commissioners, and an application for a second revival to hear a part of a claim, or a distinct claim, which might, if known, have been presented to the commissioners upon the first revival of the commission. We think it is the policy of the statute (3 Comp. Laws, § 9373), as indicated by the decisions cited, to permit a creditor to present to a revived commission any claim not theretofore presented, so long as the estate remains open. Since the order reviving the commission is a matter of right which may be made ex parte and without notice, no valid defense will be cut off by such order").

meet, take final action, and make their report within the time fixed by the order does not defeat the claims of creditors.[22]

[§ 1032] (h) Effect of Extension. An extension of time does not affect the operation of the general statute of limitations but merely gives the claimant an opportunity to present and litigate his claim, subject to all legal defenses which may have attached thereto.[23] It is the policy of a statute providing for the revival of a commission on claims on the application of a creditor who has failed to present his claim, if made at any time before the estate is closed, to permit a creditor to present to a revived commission any claim not theretofore presented so long as the estate remains open,[24] but an order reviving the commission does not cut off any valid defense against a claim.[25]

[§ 1033] d. Rights as to Subsequently Discovered Assets. Under some statutes a creditor who has not presented his claim within the regular statutory period, although precluded from sharing in the inventoried assets of the estate, is entitled to participate in subsequently discovered assets not inventoried or accounted for by the personal representative,[26] provided, however, that his claim is

[a] Debts due to the United States are payable out of subsequently discovered assets according to the rule of the text. Holland v. Cruft, 20 Pick. (Mass.) 321.

[b] Note secured by trust deed.—Although a note secured by trust deed is not exhibited to the executrix within a year from the granting of letters testamentary, yet, where the validity of the claim is admitted, the trust deed may be foreclosed, and the deficiency, if any, may be satisfied, pro rata, out of any assets not inventoried, discovered after the expiration of the year. Townsend v. Thompson, 24 Colo. 411, 51 P 433.

[c] The property liable is that which has not been inventoried or accounted for by the personal representative, regardless of the time when, or the person by whom, it is discovered. It makes no difference with the creditor's rights whether the property not inventoried is discovered before or after he obtains his judgment or brings his suit, or whether it is first discovered by him or by the personal representative. Shepard v. Lawrence County Nat. Bank, 67 Ill. 292; Stone v. Clark, 40 Ill. 411; Bradford v. Jones, 17 Ill. 93.

[d] What are subsequently discovered assets.—(1) As a general rule no property can be considered new assets which has been in the hands and under the control of the personal representative, or has been inventoried, or which is the product, profits, or proceeds of such property, although it may have assumed, or have been converted into, a new and different form. Littlefield v. Eaton, 74 Me. 516; Robinson v. Hodge, 117 Mass. 222; Alden v. Stebbins, 99 Mass. 616; Bradford v. Forbes, 9 Allen (Mass.) 365; Chenery v. Webster, 8 Allen (Mass.) 76; Veazie v. The following have been held not to be new assets subject to the claims of belated creditors: (2) Money accruing from patent rights that were inventoried. Robinson v. Hodge, 117 Mass. 222. (3) The proceeds of inventoried real estate which has been sold for the payment of debts. Alden v. Stebbins, 99 Mass. 616; Chenery v. Webster, 8 Allen (Mass.) 76 [foll Aiken v. Morse, 104 Mass. 277]. (4) The proceeds of a judgment rendered in a suit begun in the decedent's lifetime. Bradford v. Forbes, 9 Allen (Mass.) 365. (5) Property received by an administrator de bonis non in satisfaction of the liability by a surety of a former administrator who had failed to account for property inventoried. Veazie v. Marrett, 6 Allen (Mass.) 372. (6) The proceeds of notes received in payment for an inventoried interest in a partnership. Sturtevant v. Sturtevant, 4 Allen (Mass.) 422. (7) The rents of inventoried real estate. Littlefield v. Eaton, 74 Me. 516; Alden v. Stebbins, 99 Mass. 616. (8) The proceeds of logs and lumber sold from inventoried land. Littlefield v. Eaton, 74 Me. 516. (9) Profits received by the representative from the continuance of the business of the partnership in which the decedent was a partner. Copeland v. Littlefield v. Eaton, 74 Me. 516. (12) Land is subsequently discovered estate where under an erroneous construction of the will it was treated for over two years by all the parties as not belonging to the estate. Sutton v. Read, 176 Ill. 69, 51 NE 801.

[e] Property recovered by setting aside a fraudulent assignment made by the intestate in his lifetime is assets which the belated creditor can subject to his claim. Holland v. Cruft, 20 Pick. (Mass.) 321.

[f] Time of discovery.—It is not necessary that property not inventoried or accounted for be discovered before a judgment can be rendered against the administrator, but the creditor is entitled to a special judgment, payable out of assets thereafter to be inventoried, corresponding to the common-law judgment quando acciderint. Darling v. McDonald, 101 Ill. 370; Shepard v. Lawrence County Nat. Bank, 67 Ill. 292; Russell v. Hubbard, 59 Ill. 335; Stone v. Clarke, 40 Ill. 411; Peacock v. Haven, 22 Ill. 23; Bradford v. Jones, 17 Ill. 93.

[g] It is not necessary that the creditor should himself discover the assets. Shepard v. Lawrence County Nat. Bank, 67 Ill. 292.

[h] What constitutes accounting for property.—(1) Where executors fixed an appraised value to an insufficient description which they intended to represent certain land which testator had owned, and subsequently conveyed the land to the persons entitled to take under the will, and reported to the court, they had "accounted for" the land within a statute permitting a creditor not presenting his claim within two years to subject property not accounted for to the payment thereof. Auburn State Bank v. Brown, 172 Ill. 284, 50 NE 144 [aff 72 Ill. A. 584]. (2) Where a resident of Illinois died, leaving lands in Iowa which were separately devised, his executor, by probating the will in Iowa so as to give effect to the devise, "accounted for" the lands so as to place them beyond the reach of creditors who had not filed their claims within the required time. Durston v. Pollock, 91 Iowa 668, 60 NW 221.

[i] Legacy in executor's hands.—(1) Under the New Jersey statutes a creditor, who has not presented his claim in due time, and who is bound by a decree of the orphans' court barring claims of creditors against the executors, may nevertheless maintain an action against the executors to obtain payment of a ratable portion of his debt from any legacy which has not been paid over by the executors or has been attached in their hands. Dodson v. Sevars, 52 N. J. Eq. 611, 30 A 477 [aff 53 N. J. Eq. 347, 33 A 388]. (2) But these statutes give the right of action only after final settlement has been made in the court where the executor's account must be passed. Cunningham v. Stanford, 68 N. J. L. 7, 52 A 374; Emson v. Allen, 62 N. J. L. 491, 41 A 703; O'Neill v. Freeman, 45 N. J. L. 208.

[j] When statute not available.—Revisal (1905) § 94, allowing a claimant who has not presented his claim within twelve months after notice duly published, to assert his demand as against unadministered assets of the estate, is not available under § 41, if personal notice to exhibit his claim has been served on the creditor, and he fails to make exhibit within six months. Morissey v. Hill, 142 N. C. 355, 55 SE 193.

proved and allowed for this purpose.[27] The claim may be presented and allowed at any time before the debt is barred by the general statute of limitations,[28] although it will be at the expense of the claimant.[29] The creditor, if successful in establishing his claim, is entitled to a special judgment, to be satisfied out of the uninventoried assets subsequently discovered.[30]

[§ 1034] e. Rights as to Assets Remaining Unadministered. Under some statutes a creditor who has failed to present or file his claim within the required time is postponed to other creditors and not entitled to share with them in the pro rata distribution, but may obtain payment out of the assets remaining unadministered, if there are any;[31] but it has been held that the sole object of such a provision is to permit the belated creditor to reach the personal estate while subject to the control of the administrator, and that it does not give him the right to compel a sale of the land when the personal estate is exhausted.[32]

he pays a claim which has not been duly presented he is not entitled to credit for the payment.[36] In conformity to this principle it is generally held that he is bound to plead the statute, and that his failure to do so cannot avail the claimant [37] or preclude the heirs and legatees from pleading the statute on settlement of the representative's account.[38] In some jurisdictions, moreover, the representative's failure to plead the statute renders him liable for a devastavit in case payment is enforced against the estate.[39] Although by misleading statements and assurances the representative induces a creditor to omit compliance with the statute, the claim will nevertheless become barred and the representative will not be estopped to contest it,[40] unless some statutory provision intervenes whereby the creditor may be afforded relief.[41] A part payment of a claim on condition that the creditor holds the representative harmless in case of a deficiency does not affect the operation of the statute of nonclaim, or prevent the representative from objecting that the claim has not been duly presented;[42] and the representative cannot by a promise to pay revive against the estate a debt barred by the statute.[43] On the other hand there is authority for the view that formal requirements as to presentation may be waived by the personal representative,[44] and will be held to be waived where he fails to make seasonable objec-

[c] In New Jersey (1) it was formerly stated that no recognition of a claim by the personal representative or by the probate court could dispense with the requirement that claims be presented under oath and within the statutory period (Lewis v. Champion, 40 N. J. Eq. 59; Gould v. Tingley, 16 N. J. Eq. 501), (2) although it had been decided that, where the estate was solvent, the representative could pay debts which he was satisfied were just even though the claims were not verified (Kinnan v. Wight, 39 N. J. Eq. 501). (3) But it has been provided by statute (Gen. St. p 2408; Pub. L. [1898] p 739 § 68), that if the personal representative in good faith pays a claim not presented under oath, and the claim is proved to have been a just one, the representative shall have allowance for the payment if there is sufficient assets to pay the debts of equal degree in full, and that if the assets are not sufficient the representative shall be allowed for the pro rata amount which the creditor would have been entitled to receive if the claim had been presented duly verified. Brownell v. Williams, 54 Iowa 353, 6 NW 530. It was not her duty to ask for the information. It was his duty to furnish it. Neither was it her duty to point out to him omissions in his claim as presented. It was his duty to present his whole claim, all the items and details of it. Assurance from her merely that she would not pay a wrong bill did not release him from the duty of presenting his claim as required by the statute before beginning his action. At the most the assurance could only apply to the claims or items of claim that were sufficiently presented." Hurley v. Farnsworth, 107 Me. 306, 310, 78 A 291.

tion,[45] and even in jurisdictions where the representative cannot dispense with presentation there are cases holding that if he appears in court and, without raising any objection to the creditor's failure to comply with the statute, contests the claim on its merits, he waives his right of objection.[46] Where the administrator of a deceased guardian presented the guardianship account to the probate court, and obtained a decree on certain items thereof, he could not afterward object that items which were charged against the guardian in that adjudication were improperly charged, because not first presented to the commissioners of the deceased guardian's estate.[47]

Legatees and distributees may, as affects themselves, waive presentation of claims, as where they give to claimants an order on a certain fund for payment of claims.[48]

By Personal Representative—(1) In General. The personal representative is very generally authorized to pass upon the justice of claims presented against the estate, and may admit or allow the same so as to bind the estate,[49] although under some statutes, even after the admission of a claim by the personal representative, the approval of the probate court is essential to its due allowance and payment.[50] Under a statute providing that all claims must be presented and allowed before the administrator could have "rightful authority" to pay them, a payment made by the heirs of an intestate on a mortgage indebtedness owed by the latter, prior to the appointment of one of such heirs as administrator, was not validated by such appointment.[51]

Jones v. Peebles, 130 Ala. 269, 30 S 564.

[b] Circumstances not showing intention to waive notice of presentation.—An administrator wrote to persons having a claim against the estate, after the account had been filed with the probate court, stating that the account "opens new fields for operations, but we will not discuss that matter now;" that they were not very far apart, but that there were some matters which claimants would have to include, and that it was the administrator's purpose to be fair to them, and stated that they would meet when the court was held and fix the matter, as there was but little difference between them; and another letter informed claimants of the day court would convene, and requested them to come down on that date, "and we will fix our business, if we can." in a claim against his decedent's estate, he is disqualified from passing upon such claim,[52] the statute usually providing for the probate or other designated court to pass upon the claim in such case.[53] But the allowance by the representative of such a claim does not render it void.[54] An administrator who authorizes a person to purchase claims against the estate is not thereby precluded from passing upon them.[55] The fact that an administrator who is jointly liable with decedent upon a contract of guaranty allows a claim against the estate founded upon such contract does not tend to show collusion between the administrator and the claimant to allow or enforce such claim against the esate in fraud of the rights of the heirs.[56]

[§ 1038] (3) Action by One of Several Representatives. The general rule is that the allowance or rejection of a claim against the estate by one of two or more personal representatives is binding upon the estate.[57] But it has been held that the orphans' court cannot allow one executor the amount of the debt claimed by him from testator's estate, if his coexecutor disputes its payment.[58]

[§ 1039] (4) Time for Action on Claim. Executors and administrators are entitled to a reasonable time for the examination of claims and accounts against the estate before indorsing thereon their allowance or rejection.[59]

[§ 1040] (5) Effect of Failure to Act on Claim. There is considerable difference of opinion as to the effect of a failure of the representative to act on a claim within the time specified by statute, or a reasonable time, after its presentation. According to some authorities such inaction operates as an allowance of the claim,[60] which thus acquires the character of a liquidated and undisputed debt of the estate.[61] But it has also been considered that the mere failure of the representative to act on the claim does not amount to an admission of its validity by which the estate will be bound,[62] and according to numerous authorities the failure of the representative to act on the claim

[b] Newly discovered evidence.—An executor, charged with unfaithful administration because of his failure to pay creditors whose claims have been filed and allowed, cannot, under Court and Practice Act (1905) § 886, providing that within thirty days after the expiration of the statutory period for the filing and allowance of claims, and at any time thereafter before payment, on evidence discovered after the statutory period, the executor shall file a statement disallowing such claims as he intends to contest, etc., relieve himself from liability, unless he at least shows that he has some definite prospect of being able to procure testimony warranting him to contest claims, he being guilty of unfaithful administration in not disallowing a claim within the statutory time, and in not paying it within a reasonable time after the expiration of the period, where the statute specifically provides that he must pay. "Mere silence on the part of an executor or administrator after the presentation of a claim under the

within the time allowed therefore operates as a rejection.[63]

[§ 1041] (6) Form and Sufficiency of Allowance or Rejection. Any acts or statements of the representative which evince an intention to pay a claim against the estate or amount to an admission of its validity and justice will be sufficient to constitute an allowance thereof;[64] but equivocal acts or statements not evincing such an intention or amounting to such an admission are not sufficient.[65] While the decision of an executor or administrator rejecting a claim against the estate need not be in writing[66] or in any particular form,[67] the disallowance and notice thereof to the creditor should be in terms so unequivocal that the latter may know with certainty when his claim, if not sued upon, will be barred by the statute of limitations;[68] and where the personal representative does or says anything from which the creditor may reasonably infer that the determination to reject the claim is not final, but that it will be further examined and considered, such claim is not rejected within the meaning of the statutes.[69] An indorsement of the word "rejected" on a claim together with the signature of the representative's name is a sufficient rejection,[70] and a claim so indorsed is not reinstated by an erasure of the representative's signature thereto more than three months afterward.[71] An administrator rejecting a claim does not waive formal defects therein by failure to disclose the ground of rejection.[72]

[§ 1042] (7) Notice of Rejection.[73] Where the representative directs his attorney to reject a particular claim, the rejection by the attorney is as effectual as though the representative had personally notified the claimant of the rejection.[74] Where a claimant caused his claim to be prepared by a member of a firm of attorneys, and it was served on the executor, indorsed by the firm, service of notice of rejection of the claim on such firm was sufficient, although the actual employment of the attorneys had been limited to a preparation of the statute, accompanied by lapse of time, will not in any case preclude the representative from thereafter contesting its validity. If the claim is not rejected, and on an accounting no objection is taken to its allowance, then the surrogate would be authorized to treat it as an admitted claim and direct its payment. But the claim does not become established from mere silence of the executor or administrator." In re Callahan, supra.

"The presentation of a claim, followed by inaction, the executor or administrator neither admitting nor rejecting it, does not, we think, find the estate as upon an account stated. It may be justly claimed that the executor or administrator ought, in the fair discharge of his duty both to the creditor and to the estate, to examine the claim within a reasonable time and make known his position in respect to it. But it would be hazardous, in view of the ignorance or inexperience of the persons called upon to act as executors or administrators, to construe mere silence on his part as an admission that the claim was a valid one. The creditor must see to it that the claim is admitted and allowed by the executor or administrator, and an implied admission from silence is not sufficient." Schutz v. Morette, supra.

claim.[75] An executor is justified in assuming, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that his decision as to a claim presented against the estate will be communicated to the attorney for the claimant.[76]

[§ 1043] b. By Commissioners—(1) In General. Some of the statutes provide for the appointment of commissioners, for the purpose of passing upon and adjusting claims against decedents' estates,[77] and the right to have claims presented to, and passed upon by, commissioners exists even where the executor is also residuary legatee and gives bond to pay all debts and legacies.[78] But a claim need not be proved before commissioners, if the executor, as residuary legatee, has conceded his liability for it if the debt should appear to have been assumed by the testator.[79]

[§ 1044] (2) Appointment and Qualification. The power and duty to appoint commissioners is usually vested in the probate court.[80] The appointment of commissioners may be made at any time during the progress of the administration,[81] and the court may, on the application of a creditor, revive a commission after its report is filed at any time before the estate is settled.[82] Where the court neglects to appoint commissioners, the creditor has a right to call for them.[83] Notice and a hearing is a prerequisite to the granting of a petition for the renewal of a commission to receive and adjust claims,[84] and it is improper to appoint a third commissioner without notice, and on an ex parte application, where the two already appointed disagree as to a claim.[85] The commissioners should be disinterested persons,[86] and should be duly appointed and sworn before entering upon the duties of office.[87] A provision, in an order appointing a temporary administrator to pass on the claim of the administrator, that he furnish a bond and publish for two weeks notice of his appointment, is waived where the court approves the claim on the day of the order, with knowledge that bond has not been filed.[88]

[§ 1045] (3) Powers and Duties. In respect to claims accruing in the lifetime of decedent, which by law survive, and where the facts necessary to give jurisdiction and authority exist, the commissioners act judicially,[89] and their judgment, rendered upon due investigation of the claim, should be respected in the probate court and elsewhere.[90] They are usually, however, not authorized to pass upon debts and expenses incurred subsequent to decedent's death,[91] or claims which are contingent,[92] or purely equitable in their nature.[93] Where the statute makes no provision for exhibition of claims in favor of the estate before commissioners, except to offset claims presented by creditors, the commissioners have no jurisdiction, of their own motion, to allow and include in their report a claim of the estate against a creditor who did not come before them or present his claim for allowance.[94]

[§ 1046] (4) Notice of Hearing. Where the administrator appears before the commissioners appointed to hear claims, he is not prejudiced by the failure of the latter to give him statutory notice of the time and place of hearing.[95]

[§ 1047] (5) Report. The report of the commissioners should be filed within the time specified in the order appointing them or designated by statute,[96] but the fact that the report was returned before the expiration of the time for the presentment of claims does not render the same void.[97] The death of the auditor, after having adjudicated and allowed the claim, but before making his report, does not deprive the claimant of the benefit of the proof of adjudication of his claim with respect to preventing the bar of the statute of limitations.[98] The probate court has power to accept or reject the report of the commissioners, and in passing upon it is not confined to matters appearing on the face thereof, but may exercise its discretion in inquiring into the genuineness and identity of the claims and the regularity of the report generally;[99] but in order that the report of a commissioner allowing a claim shall be sustained, it is essential that the claim so allowed shall have been proved before him by competent testimony.[1] It is usually considered that the report of the commissioners allowing or disallowing a claim, when filed and approved by the probate court, is final, and has the effect of a judgment, unless duly appealed from,[2] and an objection to a report on the ground of irregularity comes too late where the correction might have been seasonably sought on appeal.[3] It has been held, however, that an order allowing a claim in a suit to settle a decedent's estate, no exception having been made to the report of the commissioner declaring it a just claim, is not final, no distribution being ordered and no final relief being given.[4]

[§ 1048] (6) Recommitment of Claim or Report. Where an auditing judge allowed a claim, but exceptions thereto, based on the incompetency of the claimant as a witness, were urged, it was held proper to recommit the matter to the auditing judge.[5] Where the authority of commissioners to allow and adjust claims had expired and all power to extend it was gone, the probate court had no authority to recommit a report on a claim to such commissioners.[6]

[§ 1049] (7) Effect of Failure to Act. Claims against the estate cannot be defeated by the failure of the commissioners to take final action and make their report within the time fixed by the order,[7] and where commissioners failed to act on a claim duly presented, and their report did not mention it, and the creditor, without legal fault, did not discover the failure until his statutory remedies had expired, it was held that he might have relief in equity.[8]

[§ 1050] (8) Compensation of Commissioners. Where a commissioner is appointed to report on claims he should be given only the statutory allowance,[9] and should be required to file a statement showing the number of days he was engaged.[10]

[§ 1051] c. By Court[11]—(1) In General. Under some statutes claims are presented to the probate court or the judge thereof for allowance, and upon due notice and opportunity given to the personal representative to appear, and upon proof of claim presented, the court or the judge will allow or disallow the claim;[12] and, under these statutes, the personal representative cannot pay any claims

[a] Jurisdiction of probate court exclusive.—Since a probate court has original and exclusive jurisdiction of the administration of the estates of deceased persons, and since under Comp. L. (1897) cc 252, 253, relating to payments of debts of estates and accounts of executors, no claims can be allowed against such estates unless presented in that court for allowance, and since an appeal to the circuit court from a will contest in the probate court does not remove the entire estate to the circuit court, but only gives that court jurisdiction to hear and determine the will contest, the circuit court, on an appeal from a will contest in the probate court, has no jurisdiction to order the allowance out of the funds of the estate of money necessary to enable the defeated parties to perfect an appeal to the supreme court. Goff v. Cass Cir. Judge, 152 Mich. 212, 115 NW 1059.

[b] It is not the province of a court of equity (1) to allow or disallow claims, or to administer the estate, especially after the subject has been entered on in the probate court. Draper v. Brown, 153 Mich. 120, 117 NW 213. (2) The general rule that a court of chancery has no power to audit a claim against the estate of a decedent is subject to an exception where the amount is not contested and all the parties affected are before the court, and the question is raised incidentally to others. Yalomstein v. Yalomstein, 190 Mich. 615, 157 NW 372.

[c] Legal or equitable demands allowable.—The probate court has jurisdiction to allow against an estate money demands, whether legal or equitable in their nature. Grimes v. Reynolds, 184 Mo. 679, 83 SW 1132 [aff 94 Mo. A. 576, 68 SW 588] (where a wife, having a separate estate, gave a note to her husband for money borrowed, and after her death he proved the note as an ordinary demand against her estate in the probate court, that court had jurisdiction to allow the demand, and the husband was not obliged to seek relief in a court of equity).

[d] Claim against representative for legal services.—Under a statute, expressly conferring jurisdiction on the county court of all matters relating to the estates of decedents, such court had jurisdiction to determine the expense incurred by an administrator for legal services, and, on the application of the attorneys rendering same, after the administrator had become a defaulter without out of the assets of the estate until allowed by the probate court.[13] But in the absence of statutory authority a probate court has no jurisdiction to direct the personal representative to pay a claim asserted against the estate.[14]

Federal courts in equity have jurisdiction to establish the claim of a foreign creditor against the estate of a decedent by a decree to that effect.[15]

Taxes assessed against the executor need not be allowed as other claims by the probate court.[16]

[§ 1052] (2) Notice of Hearing. While the probate court may order notice to parties in interest before proceeding to hear the claim of an executor against an estate, such notice is not a condition precedent to the court's jurisdiction.[17] Where an order was entered fixing the fee of an attorney appointed to represent minor devisees and legatees, as authorized by statute, the mere fact that there had been no previous account filed by the executor was insufficient to establish want of notice of the application to fix such fee to all persons interested.[18]

[§ 1053] (3) Hearing and Determination. In passing upon claims the probate court is not governed by the technical rules of the common law,[19] but where equitable relief is required, the court will adopt equitable procedure,[20] and where it appears that the claimant is equitably entitled to the amount claimed, it is proper to allow his claim.[21] Provision is sometimes made by statute for the appointment of an attorney to represent the decedent's estate where the personal representative asserts a claim against it.[22] A waiver by the administrator of notice of the presentation of a claim is not a consent to a hearing on such claim prior to the time provided by law.[23] A suspicious claim will be rejected, unless supported by very strong proof.[24]

[§ 1054] (4) Order or Decree and Record. The order or decree entered by the court on passing upon a claim against a decedent's estate should be against the executor or administrator[25] for the allowance of the claim at an amount certain to be paid out of the assets of the estate,[26] or for the disallowance of the claim.[27] The probate court has jurisdiction to make an order authorizing and di-having paid for such services, to decree that the value thereof should constitute a lien on the assets of the estate in favor of the attorneys. Carpenter v. U. S. Fidelity, etc., Co., 123 Wis. 209, 101 NW 404.

[e] Claim not within jurisdiction.—The probate court had no jurisdiction over a claim arising from the fact that mortgagees foreclosed deeds of trust given by testatrix on realty specifically devised to claimants, thus forcing claimants to pay such encumbrances. Peck v. Fillingham, 199 Mo. A. 277, 202 SW 465.

[f] Probate judge in vacation cannot allow claims. Dingle v. Pollick, 49 Mo. A. 479; Murphy v. Harris, (Miss.) 48 S 232; Chaves v. Perea, 3 N. M. 71, 2 P 73.

[g] Nonintervention will.—The probate court has no power to pass upon claims against an estate administered under a nonintervention will. Schubach v. Redelsheimer, 92 Wash. 124, 158 P 739. Nonintervention wills generally see infra §§ 2895–2902.

[h] In Quebec the court cannot authorize the testamentary executors to pay a debt of the testator unless it is ascertained and undisputed by the heirs, or the payment of it is unjustly refused by the heir, or where the heir cannot give a consent to such a payment, as in cases of unsound mind or absence, or where the heir has refused the bequest, or there is no heir or legatee. This entirely discretionary authorization will not be accorded if the debt is disputed or disputable by the heir upon apparently reasonable grounds. Ex p. Clark, 10 Que. Pr. 291.

[i] Consent of parties.—In the ordinary administration of a decedent's estate creditors are not obliged to put their claims in judgment unless they are rejected by the administrator, but the validity and amount of such claims may, by consent of the parties, be adjudicated by the surrogate. [a] Claims disallowed.—(1) Where an executor claimed to have rendered services for his testator extending over a period of nearly five years, when testator was amply able to have paid any just claim on demand but no demand was made in testator's lifetime, and the claim is made up from entries in claimant's diary which show neither any amount indicating the value of the services nor that the value had been agreed on, the claim was held unsustainable in the absence of proof of the reasonable value of the services. In re Flaacke, (N. J. Prerog.) 64 A 1026. (2) Where a petition recited a contract between petitioner and testatrix for the payment of a certain sum monthly to petitioner, and that during proceedings for the probate of the will the executors agreed to continue the payments, and did so for a time, and then refused to continue them, and the verified answer of the executrix alleged that when they made the agreement they were not acquainted with the contract and did not know that it had been rendered void because petitioner had violated conditions precedent, and that petitioner had commenced an action to have the will declared void, and the will, which was made part of the answer, showed the condition to be that petitioner should remain unmarried, and there was nothing to show she had married, and it was alleged that the will directed payment of the installment, but provided that no one contesting the will should receive any benefit thereunder, the surrogate properly treated the answer as not showing any defense to the claim. McNulty v. Hurd, 72 N. Y. 518.

27. Johnson v. Gillett, 52 Ill. 358; La Roe v. Freeland, 8 Mich. 531.

[a] Order held sufficient.—An order of the county court that "after having taken the matter under ad-

recting that a note presented as a claim against an estate be paid by the exercise by the executrix of the option therein reserved to pay by delivery of corporate stock.[28] The order of entry and allowance is sufficient, although not signed by the county judge, where the claim appears on the schedule of claims, showing its allowance on the day fixed for hearing claims, and also on the entry book, in the handwriting of the county judge, showing the name of the claimant, the amount of the claim, and the amount allowed on such day.[29] Where the estate is insufficient to pay general claims in full, an order directing payment of a particular claim in full, without determining whether such claim is preferred, is improper.[30] Where a defendant who has a claim against an estate files an answer in which he sets up that there is in his hands for collection an amount in notes owing to the estate larger than the amount of his claim, and the commissioner reports that he will retain such claim out of the funds in his hands when collected, it is not error for the court, after the death of the one asserting the claim, to decree to his personal representatives upon an answer filed for that purpose, the amount of the claim asserted by the decedent, there being no proof that he in his lifetime collected and retained the amount, nor any contention that the claim is not a just charge against the estate.[31] Where a claim against an estate was erroneously presented to the probate court for allowance by the administrator, instead of by the claimant, accompanied by the affidavit required by statute, a judgment of the probate court allowing the claim and directing its payment out of the assets of the estate was void for want of jurisdiction.[32] A judgment allowing claims possesses all the attributes of judgments of courts of general jurisdiction and is res judicata as to all issues properly belonging in the case.[33] The court has, however, inherent power to correct or amend its own order or decree[34] or its records.[35] A claim shown to have been filed after it was barred by limitations will not be presumed to have been allowed by the court unless that fact affirmatively appears upon the record.[36]

[§ 1055] (5) Effect of Failure of Court to Act. Under some statutes the failure of the probate judge to indorse his allowance or rejection upon a claim within a designated time after it has been presented to him is equivalent to a rejection,[37] but such a provision is not applicable to claims pending in the probate court upon an order setting aside their former allowance by the administrator upon objections by the heirs.[38]

[§ 1056] (6) Approval after Rejection. It is usually held that a claim may be approved and allowed by a county judge after it has been rejected, either by nonaction or written indorsement, at any time before it is barred by limitations;[39] but, on the other hand, an order purporting to allow a claim after it had been disallowed by the personal representative has been held void.[40]

[§ 1057] d. Set-Off. The statutes usually provide that, where a creditor presents a claim to the commissioners, or to the court of probate, the personal representative may exhibit claims of the deceased as a set-off to the claim of the creditor, and the commissioners or the court shall ascertain and allow the balance against or in favor of the estate, as they shall find the same to be;[41] and it has been held that a claim not so asserted cannot subsevisement, the court this day, after due deliberation, rejects the claim" is a sufficiently formal judgment. Johnson v. Gillett, 52 Ill. 358.

[c] A claim under a contract which is void as against public policy quently be enforced against the creditor, or set off by the personal representative in an action to enforce an allowance against the estate.[42] But it has also been considered that, where the representative relies upon the assurance of the creditor and omits to assert a proper set-off to the claim before the commissioners, so that the set-off becomes barred and the time for renewing the commission expires, the acts of the claimant will be deemed a constructive fraud, and equity will grant relief.[43] Under a statute requiring a claimant to file an affidavit that the claim is justly due and that there are no just counterclaims to the same, a demand against which there exists an equitable set-off or counterclaim may be adjusted in equity before it is allowed and paid out of the decedent's estate.[44]

[§ 1058] e. Setting Aside Allowance—(1) In General. The probate court has, as a general rule, power to set aside the allowance or disallowance of a claim against a decedent's estate,[45] especially where such allowance or disallowance was obtained ex parte.[46] A suit in equity may also be maintained to set aside for fraud an order or decree of the probate court allowing a claim against a decedent's estate;[47] and the statutory remedy for the vacation of the allowance in the probate court is not exclusive, but concurrent with the remedy afforded by such a suit.[48] An administrator who has disallowed a claim may afterward, it has been held, revoke his action, and allow the same;[49] but it has been held that, where the administrator has allowed a claim in full, he cannot withdraw such allowance by protesting against an approval thereof by the court.[50]

[§ 1059] (2) Who May Attack Allowance. Heirs and devisees[51] and distributees and legatees as well as personal representatives[52] may move to have an allowance set aside on proper grounds, when injuriously affected thereby, no matter how small their interests in the estate may be. A receiver of decedent's estate represents the interests of the creditors as well as of the estate, and, if a motion by the receiver to set aside an order of the surrogate granting allowances out of the estate is denied, the motion cannot be renewed by the creditors or any one of them without leave of court.[53]

But a party who appears and contests the allowance of a claim cannot afterward move to vacate the allowance on the same ground on which he contested it.[54]

[§ 1060] (3) Time for Application. Proceedings to vacate an order of allowance or classification of claims must be brought within the time limited by statute if there is any statute applicable thereto,[55] otherwise it has been held that they must be brought within a reasonable time.[56] In some states, however, the allowance may be vacated at any time while the estate remains unsettled,[57] and a mistake may be corrected by equitable proceedings even after final settlement and discharge of the representative.[58]

[§ 1061] (4) Grounds. The discretionary power of the probate court to amend or vacate its own orders or judgments continues only until the expiration of the term at which such orders or judgments were rendered,[59] and after that time the court can act in respect to the matter only according to fixed principles of law,[60] and unless a motion to vacate made at a subsequent term presents some of the grounds enumerated in the statute it cannot be granted.[61] The usual grounds for vacating or setting aside an order or decree of the probate court allowing or disallowing a claim are that such order or judgment was procured by fraud or misrepresentation, or through mistake, surprise, or excusable inadvertence or neglect,[62] or that proper notice was not given to the personal representative or the creditors of the estate.[63] Where an administratrix with the will annexed has told the beneficiaries under the will that she would not assert any claim against the estate, and afterward, without notice, filed a personal claim which was allowed, equity will set the allowance aside.[64] The mere fact that a claim was barred by the general statute of limitations when allowed has been held to be no ground for setting aside an allowance thereof,[65] particularly where the personal representative had not availed himself of such plea;[66] but

"Courts of probate jurisdiction are very jealous in guarding the interests of the estates of deceased persons, and when the action of any party connected with the administration of such estates is tainted in the slightest degree with fraud, such courts will take jurisdiction for the purpose of remedying whatever injury the estate may have suffered thereby." Dariano v. Fidalgo, 14 Philippine 62, 67.

[a] "That parties having an interest in the estate may contest the allowance of a claim on the ground of fraud and collusion is well settled." In re Douglas, 140 Iowa 603, 606, 117 NW 982.

[b] Presumption as to grounds.—Where the grounds on which a county court at a subsequent term vacated orders allowing claims and approving the widow's allowance do not appear, the vacation is presumed to have been for fraud or mistake. Clemes v. Fox, 25 Colo. 39, 53 P 225.

[c] Negligence not sufficient ground.—It must be shown that the claim was allowed through fraud and collusion with the executor, and not through negligence. Sherman v. Whiteside, 190 Ill. 576, 60 NE 838 [aff 93 Ill. A. 572].

[d] Constructive fraud of administrator.—An administrator is guilty of at least constructive fraud when he procures the allowance of a claim, without contest, by purchasing the shares of the only objecting heirs who were within the jurisdiction, and a judgment allowing such claim should be vacated for his fraud. Gorham v. Gorham, 54 Ind. A. 408, 103 NE 16.

[e] Claim afterward discovered to have been paid.—Where a mortgage note of decedent has been placed on the tableau of debts by the administrator as a valid claim against the succession, and he afterward finds evidence of its payment in whole or in part, and applies to the court to correct the error, and gives notice of his application to the parties interested, proof will be received of such payment and effect given to it, and the debt will be stricken from the tableau, or so much thereof as is satisfactorily proved to have been paid. Lyons' Succ., Mann. Unrep. Cas. (La.) 312.

[f] Excuse for nonappearance held insufficient. — Where a claim against an estate filed by an administrator was allowed a subsequent vacation of the allowance on the application of one who knew of the time for hearing, but failed to appear and oppose the claim, and whose only excuse for not appearing was that he felt confident that the administrator would administer the estate honestly and not permit unjust claims to be allowed, was an abuse of discretion. 65. Dyer v. Jacoway, 50 Ark. 217, 6 SW 902; Shurbun v. Hooper, 40 Mich. 503.

[a] Reason for rule.—"If there was any objection growing out of the statute of limitations to the validity of the claims passed upon, it should have been raised before the commissioners or on appeal, and cannot properly be considered in this action." Shurbun v. Hooper, 40 Mich. 503 [quot Andrews v. Osborne, 159 Mich. 77, 82, 123 NW 599].

[b] Where most of the items of a claim were not barred by limitations, the fact that some of them were barred did not oust the probate court of jurisdiction, and was not ground for setting aside the probate in an action by decedent's heirs against legatees of the claimant. Andrews v. Osborne, 159 Mich. 77, 123 NW 599.

66. Marshall v. Coleman, 187 Ill. 556, 58 NE 628 [mod 89 Ill. A. 41].

there is also authority for the view that the fact that a claim was barred by limitations is a sufficient reason for setting it aside at the suit of the heirs.[67] Where the allowance or disallowance of a claim is sought to be set aside on the ground of newly discovered evidence, it should be shown why such evidence could not with due diligence have been furnished earlier; and to be available as a ground for reopening the case such evidence should be controlling and not cumulative only.[68]

[§ 1062] (5) Proceedings. If an order is made out of court and without notice allowing a claim against an estate, no notice of a motion to set it aside is necessary;[69] and a claimant, who is ruled to pay back money which the court, under a clear mistake, has directed its commissioner to pay him, is not prejudiced by a failure to notify him of the motion to correct the judgment.[70] It has been held that a notice of motion to open an order disallowing a claim can be properly served on the attorney for the administrator if this is done before an order of final distribution.[71] As a general rule, where fraud is relied on, the facts constituting the alleged fraud must be set out;[72] and a petition to vacate the report of commissioners of an estate is fatally defective where it does not allege the date of decedent's death or of the appointment of the administrator, or whether the estate has been fully administered.[73] An affidavit following the language of the statute may be sufficient.[74] An objection going to the sufficiency of the application to vacate the allowance of a claim should be raised by demurrer and not by motion to strike out.[75] Since an order of the probate court allowing or disallowing a claim has substantially the effect of a judgment,[76] where proceedings are instituted to vacate such order or decree, the presumption is that the allowance was made upon satisfactory vouchers and proofs, or that the claim was disallowed for want of sufficient evidence or some fatal irregularity, and the burden of proving otherwise is upon the party seeking to vacate the order or decree.[77] Affidavits may properly be filed in support of a motion by heirs of a decedent to set aside an allowance of a claim against the estate.[78] The moving party is not required to give such proof against the allowance as would be required to defeat the claim on a hearing on the merits, but only such a probable showing against the propriety of the allowance as will convince the court that the matter ought to be reheard;[79] and it has been held that the court may set aside or modify the allowance of a claim against the estate approved by the administrator and allowed by the clerk in vacation without any evidence except what may be shown by the papers.[80] Where the administrator makes no showing of facts in resistance of an application to set aside an order allowing his claim against the estate, the court may treat the application as true and grant relief.[81] The fact that a claimant obtained an allowance of his claim for more than he was entitled to does not establish fraud in obtaining the allowance;[82] but a holding that the allowance of an executor's claim against the estate was fraudulent is justified, where it seems that it was such executor's intention to secure its allowance without the knowledge of the residuary legatee, since he filed it after the time fixed for the presentation of claims and without notice to the residuary legatee, although he was aware of its existence at that time and the claim as filed affords no light to any one who might dispute it.[83] Where it is sought to set aside the allowance of claims upon the ground that they were barred by limitations, mere proof that the claims themselves appeared on their face to be barred is insufficient without evidence of the nonexistence of the facts or circumstances which would have taken the claims out of the operation of the statute at the time when they were allowed.[84] If the allowance is set aside, the probate court has jurisdiction to determine on a hearing whether the claim should be allowed at all.[85]

[§ 1063] f. Effect of Allowance or Rejection—(1) By Probate Court—(a) Upon Claimant and Personal Representative. While the allowance or disallowance of a claim against an estate by the probate court, either directly or by way of approval of the act of commissioners or the personal representative in reference to such claim, may not be regarded as a judgment in the strict sense of the term,[86] it operates as an adjudication between the claimant and the personal representative, and binds the latter and the estate equally with the former.[87] So when claims have been once allowed against the estate, payment can be enforced without any revivor against a new administrator.[88] It has been held that an artisan's lien is not affected by the lienor's presenting his claim to the probate court and the allowance of the same;[89] and that the mere disallowance of part of a claim secured by

Barclay v. Barclay, 230 Pa. 467, 79 A 667.

[b] Prima facie evidence in other proceedings.—"A decree of the orphans' court awarding to a creditor his claim against a decedent's estate, is prima facie evidence of the correctness of the claim in other proceedings." Reichner v. Reichner, 237 Pa. 540, 548, 85 A 877.

[c] Limitations of the rule.—(1) The rule that the allowance of claims by the probate court is tantamount to a judgment applies only to such claims as were debts against decedent himself and not to expenses of the administrator; and the latter are not conclusively determined until final settlement and judgment thereon. In re Erickson, 78 Nebr. 642, 111 NW 356. (2) "While an administrator will be protected, even against the heirs, in the payment of a claim duly allowed and ordered paid in due course of administration, though it subsequently develops that such claim was not proper to be allowed for payment, yet this rule is restricted to such claims allowed and paid in good faith and without fraudulent connivance of an administrator having knowledge at the time of payment that such claim should not have been allowed." Whittemore v. Coleman, 144 Ill. A. 109, 112 [aff 239 Ill. 450, 88 NE 228].

[d] Judgment of referee where executor does not present facts within his knowledge.—Where, on presentation of a claim against the estate of a decedent by his widow, it was disallowed by the executors and referred, but the executors not only failed to defend the claim, but failed to present the facts within their knowledge to the referee, his judgment allowing the claim could not be relied on to protect the executors in their payment of it. Matter of Watson, 115 App. Div. 310, 100 NYS 993 [aff 187 N. Y. 541 mem, 80 NE 1122 mem].

[e] Merely a protection of representative.—The orphans' court passing a claim has no power to determine the rights of the claimant against the estate, or to order the payment of the claim, and its decision is only prima facie, and operates as a protection to the executor in the event of its liquidation by a disbursement of the funds held by him in his representative capacity. Houck v. Houck, 112 Md. 122, 76 A 581; Levering v. Levering, 64 Md. 399, 2 A 1; State v. Reigart, 1 Gill (Md.) 1, 39 AmD 628.

[f] Approval by clerk of allowance by executor.—The allowance of a claim against the estate by an executor and the approval thereof by the clerk is not final, but provisional and temporary, and finality can only be predicated upon allowance by the court itself under the statute. mortgage, in the absence of proof as to the ground of disallowance, does not bar proceedings to foreclose the mortgage.[90]

[§ 1064] (b) Upon Heirs, Distributees, Etc. While the allowance of a claim against the estate by the court has been held to be prima facie binding on the heirs where they had due notice of the hearing and an opportunity to oppose the claim,[91] even though they did not avail themselves of the opportunity,[92] the general rule is that the allowance of a claim by the probate or county court is not conclusive as against the heir or distributee, and that he may contest such allowance when the representative's final account is presented for approval.[93] Neither does the allowance of a claim against the personal representative have the effect of creating a technical lien on the land as against the heir or devisee.[94]

[§ 1065] (2) By Commissioners. The decision of commissioners on claims in the probate court is in no sense a common-law judgment,[95] but such commissioners act in a judicial capacity and their action in a case of which they have jurisdiction, unappealed from, is conclusive.[96] In a suit by an executor to set aside a conveyance by his testator in alleged fraud of creditors, the allowance by commissioners of claims which do not show on their face that they accrued after testator's death constitutes prima facie evidence of their existence before that period.[97]

[§ 1066] (3) By Personal Representative. It is usually considered that claims presented to the personal representatives and admitted and allowed by them acquire the character of liquidated and undisputed debts against the estate;[98] and the representatives cannot thereafter question the propriety of

"Defendant, as one of those entitled to participate in the distribution of his mother's estate, might, no doubt, have appeared and resisted the allowance of the claim; but his failure to do so would not, in our judgment, preclude him from questioning the validity of the claim after it was allowed by the probate court, when it was sought in this proceeding to subject to the payment of such claim the real estate which defendant claimed title to under a deed executed before the death of his mother." Levi v. Levi, 156 Iowa 297, 305, 136 NW 696.

[a] An ex parte approval (1) is not conclusive against persons beneficially interested Minor v. Harding, 4 La. 378. (2) "The allowance was entirely ex parte; and it was not the intention of the statute to make such ex parte allowance a judgment, concluding the rights of the heirs. It is merely the acknowledgment of such claim as a claim against the estate, to be paid in the due course of administration, subject, however, to be challenged and contested in the manner specified under the statute; and this must necessarily be so, because if the judgment was binding upon the heirs of the estate, then it would become so without their having any opportunity of contesting the same or offering proof to the probate judge with reference to such claim, and their interests would be bound without having had an opportunity to appear and contest such claim; but this contention is disproved by the provisions of the statute itself, which gives the right to any heir to contest any claim upon the hearing of the account rendered by the administrator." In re Coryell, 16 Ida. 201, 213, 101 P 723.

[b] The report of a conservator charging for personal services, filed after the death of his ward, made a part of his subsequent report as "conservator and administrator," and approved by the court without notice to the heirs at law, is not a final adjudication of such claim, but is open to investigation on hearing of a petition to sell real estate for the payment of debts. Houchens v. Houchens, 173 Ill. A. 174.

[d] "As to the personal estate, the allowance of a claim against an estate, not appealed from, is conclusive, not only upon the executors, but also upon the heirs and legatees, unless its allowance was procured by fraud and collusion between the claimant and the personal representatives. . . . [a] Compromise agreement.—An executor who for a sufficient consideration has entered into a compromise agreement with a claimant against the estate is estopped to repudiate anything conceded thereby. Todd v. Terry, 26 Mo. A. 598.

[b] Contingent claim.—An executor's approval of a claim, upon its face merely contingent, whether in conjunction with the ex parte act of the probate judge or not, cannot give it the validity of a judgment. Pico v. De la Guerra, 18 Cal. 422. See Blanchard v. Conger, 61 Iowa 153, 16 NW 59 (recognizing rule).

[c] Contrary view.—(1) Allowance of the claim is not conclusive of its validity against the estate, and it may be contested by either the administrator who allowed it or the administrator de bonis non. Thomas v. Chamberlain, 39 Oh. St. 112. (2) A successor in the administration is not bound by the act of his predecessor in admitting the justness of a their approval of a claim, unless there is manifest error.[99] Such action has been held to fix a new date, as of the date of presentation, from which the statute of limitation runs against the claim.[1] The allowance by an administrator of a claim based upon notes upon which the administrator and decedent had guaranteed payment does not render the claim void or uncollectable even if the allowance by the administrator was a nullity.[2] The heir is not bound by the extrajudicial statement of the personal representative that he believes the debt to be due,[3] or by his formal approval or allowance of a claim,[4] although the admission of the representative that a claim against an estate is valid establishes its validity prima facie and puts the burden of proving otherwise upon one who objects to it.[5] The rejection of a claim by an executor or administrator is of no judicial force whatever, and cannot affect the creditor's right of action, but it merely remits him to his remedy by an action at law or the special proceeding allowed by statute to establish and enforce his claim.[6] It is not incumbent upon the representative to file in the probate court a claim which he has rejected.[7]

[§ 1067] (4) Allowance of Portion of Claim. It has been held that the allowance by the personal representative of a portion of a claim against the estate and its approval by the probate court is not an adjudication as to the balance of the claim, which may be considered and disposed of just as if no such allowance had been made.[8] But there is also authority for the view that the allowance by the representative of a claim for less than the full amount thereof is a rejection of the rest of the claim;[9] and the creditor may treat such partial allowance as a rejection of the entire claim and sue for the entire amount,[10] although where the holder of a note secured by mortgage presents a claim based thereon to the administrator of the debtor and obtains the allowance of interest to a specified time, he is not deprived of his right to future interest.[11]

[§ 1068] g. Collateral Attack. The action of the probate court in allowing or disallowing a claim against the estate is not subject to collateral attack;[12] and the same is true of a final decree bar-claim. McKnoll v. Wear, 1 Ky. Op. 447.

[§ 1069] h. Appeal and Review—(1) In General. The statutes usually permit an appeal from a final order, judgment, or decree of the probate court or commissioners, allowing a claim against a decedent's estate.[14] In some jurisdictions the disallowance of a claim by the court is regarded as a final order which may be reviewed by appeal or writ of error;[15] but in others no appeal will lie from the disallowance of a claim, the remedy of the party aggrieved being an action at law to enforce his claim.[16] Merely interlocutory orders or decrees with reference to the allowance of claims are not appealable,[17] nor will any appeal lie from a merely ministerial act of the judge.[18] It has been held that a question of the validity of an order of the probate court granting a renewal of a commission to receive claims against a decedent's estate was properly brought before the county court by an appeal from the report of the commissioners.[19]

[§ 1070] (2) Objections and Exceptions.[20] Objections in the nature of exceptions to irregularities in the proceedings, on the hearing on a claim against a decedent's estate, previous to the final decree, must be taken at the time of the hearing, in order to be available on appeal.[21]

[§ 1071] (3) Who May Appeal.[22] As a general rule any person affected by a judgment or decree of the probate court with respect to claims against the estate may appeal therefrom, whether a party to the record or not.[23] Appellant must, however, show an interest in the matter litigated; a grievance, in the legal sense, existing only when the judgment, order, or decree complained of bears upon his interest;[24] and in several jurisdictions, creditors, devisees, legatees, or heirs can appeal from the decision of the commissioners or the probate court, only where the personal representative fails or declines to take such appeal.[25]

[§ 1072] (4) Time for Appealing.[26] Statutes giving the right of appeal from an order or decree of the probate court usually require the appeal to be taken within a prescribed time after the date of entry of such order or decree.[27] But the practice sometimes permits of an application for leave to appeal after the time limited for taking the appeal has expired.[28]

[§ 1073] (5) Application, Bond, and Notice.[29] An application for appeal need not set forth upon oath a formal statement of the facts, but records of the probate court, or if need be evidence aliunde may supply the appellate court with the requisite proof.[30] Under the statutes of several states, the giving of a bond with sureties approved by the court is a condition precedent to the right to appeal,[31] and it is also ordinarily required that a notice of appeal should be given by appellant to the other parties in interest.[32]

[§ 1074] (6) Pleading on Appeal. In some states formal pleadings are not required on appeal.[33] It is sometimes required that, on appeal from the rejection of a claim by commissioners, the declaration must conform to the claim and the bill of particulars,[34] and such an appeal is properly dismissed where it appears that no service of the petition and declaration has been made upon the administrator;[35] but it has been held that, where no new issue is formed in the circuit court, and no declaration is filed, the report of the commissioners setting forth the nature of the claim will stand as a declaration in the case.[36] Under a statute requiring that a statement of the nature and amount of a claim filed on appeal from a disallowance thereof by the commissioners shall conform so far as may be, in form and substance, to the requirements of a complaint on the claim in a civil action, such statement controls the amount recoverable as fully as the ad damnum clause in a complaint in such an action.[37]

[§ 1075] (7) Effect of Appeal. The general rule is that an appeal from an order or decree of the probate court allowing or disallowing a claim has the effect of vacating such order or decree,[38] and the same has been held to be true of an appeal from the action of commissioners appointed to pass on claims,[39] although it has been held that such an appeal is not the initiation of a new proceeding, but merely the continuance of the same proceeding, transferring the case from one tribunal to another,[40] where, in some jurisdictions, the matter is tried de novo without regard to what was adjudicated by the commissioners or the court below.[41] A claimant who appeals from the rejection of his claim waives his right to ask for the appointment of a third commissioner.[42] In the Philippine Islands the perfection of an appeal by the administrator is equivalent to the institution of a separate action in the court of first instance.[43]

[§ 1076] (8) Proceedings in Appellate Court. The presumption is in favor of the regularity of the presentment and proof in the lower tribunal,[44] but upon a review of matters wholly within the discretion of the probate court, all of the facts which may have actuated the court should be presented.[45] The action of the lower court will not be disturbed unless manifest error is made to appear;[46] and the order, judgment, or decree of the lower tribunal will not be reversed where the error complained of is harmless,[47] or for causes not apparent of record.[48] Want of due notice to the representative may, however, afford a sufficient ground for a reversal.[49] In a number of jurisdictions, on appeal from the order or decree of the probate court, there is a trial de novo,[50] each party being entitled to a trial by jury at his election,[51] and if the claimant declines to make proof of his claim in the court to which the appeal is taken, the case must be dismissed.[52] On motion of appellant the court may require the claimant to make his claim more specific and definite.[53] On the trial of an appeal the case cannot be enlarged and no claim can be heard which was not passed upon in the first instance;[54] and where a claim is allowed in part and disallowed in part, and an appeal is taken as to the part allowed, but there is no appeal as to the part disallowed, the portion of the claim which was disallowed is not before the appellate court, and such disallowance cannot be reviewed.[55] The validity of a judgment of the probate court allowing and classifying a claim cannot be questioned on appeal from a denial of an order to pay the demand pursuant to the judgment.[56]

[§ 1077] i. Costs and Allowances. The allowance of costs to the party prevailing and against the unsuccessful party is usually within the discretion of the court.[57] In some jurisdictions, where a formal presentment and establishment of claims against the estate is requisite, costs are allowed the successful claimant where his claim is contested,[58] if such claim was properly presented.[59] But an estate is not liable for the costs on claims filed after the term of court designated by the statutes for the adjustment thereof.[60] It has been held that the costs cannot be taxed against a claimant, unless his claim was filed more than a year after the issuance of letters of administration and due notice thereof.[61] An administratrix appealing from an order disallowing claims cannot complain that costs on affirmance were taxed against her as administratrix, and not against her distributive share as an heir.[62]

Attorney's fees cannot be allowed on a note presented against an estate, where the note does not provide therefor,[63] and the failure to claim attorney's fees when notes were originally presented, and the allowance of the claims without attorney's fees, will constitute a bar to a subsequent action to recover them.[64] Where a note signed by defendant's intestate provided for ten per cent attorneys' fees if placed with attorneys for collection, and after defendant's appointment as administrator, he notified claimant to present his claims for payment, but the note was not due, and claimant informed him that he had a year in which to present the claim, and thereafter, when interest on the note became due, placed the note with his own attorneys, who presented the claim and demanded attorneys' fees, claimant was not entitled to attorneys' fees.[65] Under a statute providing that no action shall be brought by summons and complaint against an administrator on a claim against decedent, but the holder, whether the claim is due or not, shall file a statement thereof in the office of the clerk of the court in which the estate is pending, the payee of a note of a decedent which provides for the payment of attorney's fees is not entitled to attorney's fees where a claim on the note is filed before it is due or there has been any breach of condition.[66]

[a] Widow.—Under a statute, authorizing any heir or creditor of a deceased person to request an administrator or executor to reject any claim presented for allowance, a widow may file a requisition on an executor to disallow a claim, as the words "any heir," or "creditor," include devisees and legatees or any person whomsoever whose property may be affected by the recovery of a judgment. Todd v. Todd, 27 Oh. Cir. Ct. 224.

[b] One who has purchased real estate which, there being no personal property, is liable to be sold by the administrator to make assets to pay an allowance, if it is a legal charge against the estate, has such an interest as gives him a right to contest its validity. Mackey v. Ballou, 112 Ind. 198, 13 NE 715.

[c] A judgment in favor of a representative upon a claim presented by him and rejected by the judge may be contested by any person interested in the estate in the same manner as other allowed claims; but in such cases the burden is upon the person contesting to show that the claim was not properly allowed. In re More, 121 Cal. 635, 54 P 148.

[d] Opposing revival of commission or new commission.—The executor and others interested have a right to appear and contest an application for the allowance or revival of a commission, or the appointment of new commissioners to allow claims not presented to the first commissioners. assets are insufficient to pay the claims of all.[73] But an objection cannot be made by a person who, although interested in the estate, could not be benefited by a disallowance of the claim,[74] and a fortiori one who is not interested in the estate has no right to contest the allowance of claims against it.[75]

[§ 1080] b. Duty of Representative to Contest Claims.[76] It is the duty of the representative to contest all claims presented against the estate which he believes, or has reason to believe, are unfounded or unjust,[77] or which are not presented and authenticated according to the requirements of the statute.[78] But the propriety of contesting particular claims must frequently be left largely to the representative's discretion and no presumption of bad faith or misconduct will be made against him.[79]

[§ 1081] c. Grounds of Objection. The executor or administrator is entitled to avail himself of any equitable or legal defense existing against the claim presented for allowance.[80] Objections to a claim may be based on a denial of its justice or validity,[81] or may rest on the ground that the claim is barred,[82] or that the claimant has not complied with the statutory requirements as to its presentation and authentication.[83] But it is not a valid objection to the claim of a creditor that a similar demand has been presented against another estate,[84] or to the claim of a representative that he has not filed his administration bond.[85]

[§ 1082] d. Time for Making Objection. Where the time for making objections is limited by statute, no objection can be made after the time limited on any ground existing prior to the expiration of this period,[86] but objections founded on matters subsequently occurring may be interposed at any time prior to the rendition of a final decree in favor of the creditor,[87] and the court may also in its discretion extend the time originally limited.[88] An objection for want of proper authentication of a claim may be made at any time before final judgment,[89] but not thereafter.[90] So also an objection that a claim was never presented to an executor is too late after the court, in settling the executor's account, has made an order for the payment of the claim.[91] Distributees may contest a claim of the representative without waiting for him to exhibit an administration account including the same.[92]

[§ 1083] e. Mode of Making Objection. The representative is not required to specify objections to a claim,[93] but his objections may be orally interposed.[94] So also it has been held that a general objection by the widow in her own behalf, and as guardian of an infant child, to the allowance of a claim founded on a note, a copy of which was filed, was sufficient, and the defenses of limitations, and of the failure to file the note itself, were available.[95] A notice served by an executor that he doubts the justice of a verified claim against the estate and offers to refer it binds him and estops him from claiming that he rejected the claim.[96]

[§ 1084] f. Waiver of Objections and Estoppel.[97] Mere silence on the part of a representative after presentation of a claim, accompanied by lapse of time, will not preclude him from thereafter contesting its validity,[98] unless in jurisdictions where failure to act on the claim amounts to an allowance.[99] But by filing at the instance of an alleged creditor an account including the latter's claim the representative will be estopped to dispute its validity,[1] and if by verbally admitting the validity of a claim and stating that it will be paid he induces a third person to take the claim he cannot thereafter contest it in the hands of such third person.[2] A failure to object to a claim for want of affidavit and proof, until after judgment, is a waiver of the objection.[3] Refusal to pay a claim on the sole ground that it was not presented in time is a waiver of objections as to the manner in which it was presented,[4] and objections based on irregularities in filing and docketing a claim are waived by a general appearance of the representative.[5] So also where the court has jurisdiction of the subject matter, an executor who appears and files his demurrer to a paragraph of a claim which had never been placed on the appearance docket for rejection or allowance by him waives the objection that the claim had not been filed;[6] and where the representative waives his statutory right to require that a claimant shall bring his claim against the estate before the court in the mode prescribed by the decedents' act, his demurrer to an entire claim consisting of several distinct items will not be sustained if any one of such items states a good cause of action.[7] Where, after a claim against a decedent's estate had been transferred to the issue docket, the claimant was permitted, without objection on the part of the administrator, to amend the statement by introducing therein an item of claim based on facts which accrued after the claim was filed in the clerk's office and was placed on the docket on which it was the administrator's duty to allow or reject claims, the administrator could not by answer in bar of such part of the claim raise an objection which he had so waived to the making of such amendment.[8] Where an administratrix as such pays a portion of a bill of an expert accountant, and it is agreed between them that the accountant shall present his claim for the balance against the estate and that the administratrix shall not be held personally responsible therefor, the administratrix cannot object to the payment of the balance out of the estate merely because she is the sole distributee thereof.[9]

The heirs may be estopped by their conduct from contesting a claim,[10] and where they are estopped the representative is also estopped in a proceeding where he represents only their interests.[11]

[§ 1085] 2. Proceedings for Determination as to Disputed Claims—a. Arbitration[12]—(1) Right to Submit. The general rule at common law, which is also established by express statutes in some jurisdictions, is that an executor or an administrator has the right to submit to arbitration claims against the estate which he represents.[13] No special authority from the probate court is required for the

[a] Source of power.—(1) The power arose by reason of the full dominion which the law gives to the executor or administrator over the assets, and the full discretion which is vested in him for the settlement and liquidation of all claims due to and from the estate. District of Columbia v. Bailey, 171 U. S. 161, 18 SCt 868, 43 L. ed. 118 [rev on other grounds 9 App. (D. C.) 360]. (2) The power results from the representative's power to settle all claims in favor of or against the estate which he represents. Nelson v. Cornwell, 11 Gratt. (52 Va.) 724. (3) It is "based upon the fact that he has power to prosecute or defend suits." Cogswell v. Concord, etc., R. Co., 68 N. H. 192, 194, 44 A 293.

[b] Effect of statutes.—The common-law power in regard to submitting to arbitration is not affected or impaired in any way by the statutes. The purpose and effect of the statutes are to relieve executors and administrators from individual liability for any injury to the estate that might result from the arbitration. Overly v. Overly, 1 Metc. (Ky.) 117; Logsdon v. Roberts, 3 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 255; Chadbourn v. Chadbourn, 9 Allen (Mass.) 173; Wood v. Tunnicliff, 74 N. Y. 38; Powers v. Douglass, 53 Vt. 471, 38 AmR 699.

[c] One of two administrators may submit a matter in dispute between himself in right of his intestate and another to arbitration and the award will bind the estate. Grace v. Sutton, 5 Watts (Pa.) 540.

[d] Deputy sheriff.—When the administration of an estate has been committed to the sheriff, the deputy sheriff has no power to submit to arbitration a suit to which the decedent was a party in his lifetime, and which has been revived in the name of the sheriff. Thompson v. Thompson, 6 Munf. (20 Va.) 514.

[e] A special administrator cannot submit claims to arbitration. Sullivan v. Nicoulin, 113 Iowa 76, 84 NW 978.

[f] Claims not referable under the statute may be submitted to arbitration. Wood v. Tunnicliff, 74 N. Y. 38.

exercise of this right,[14] unless, as is frequently the case, the statute requires the sanction of the probate court;[15] nor is the right affected by statutory provisions authorizing a reference of disputed claims.[16] In a few jurisdictions, however, the right of the representative to submit to arbitration has been denied.[17] The heirs or other persons beneficially interested have no right to submit a claim against the estate to arbitration while the estate is subject to administration.[18]

[§ 1086] (2) Submission—(a) Form. A valid submission to arbitration may be made by parol,[19] and there need not be any express agreement to abide by the award, as this will be implied from the fact of submission.[20]

[§ 1087] (b) Effect. An agreement to submit to arbitration is not an admission of assets,[21] unless the representative covenants to abide by and pay the amount of the award,[22] and not even then if from the articles of submission a contrary intention appears.[23] But such submission will preclude a plea of plene administravit in an action on the award.[24]

[§ 1088] (3) Powers of Arbitrators. The powers of arbitrators and the extent of their authority depend upon the terms of the agreement between the parties,[25] which will be strictly construed.[26] A statute conferring on orphans' courts the power, with the consent of the parties, to arbitrate between a claimant and an administrator has been held to refer only to claims against the estate which are asserted against the administrator in his fiduciary character.[27]

[§ 1089] (4) Award—(a) Form. Where claims against a person both individually and in his capacity as executor or administrator are submitted to arbitration, the award should clearly distinguish between moneys which are to be paid by him in his fiduciary character and those for which he is personally bound.[28]

[§ 1090] (b) Operation and Effect. At common law a representative who submits disputed claims to arbitration acts at his peril, and if the award is less favorable to the estate than an action at law would be he may be held liable to account for the loss to the heirs of other persons interested in the estate;[29] but the award is binding and the injury can be redressed only by charging the representative with a devastavit.[30] This rule has, however, been changed by statute in some jurisdictions.[31] The award is binding upon the representative,[32] in his fiduciary capacity,[33] and upon the

Ont.—Reid v. Reid, 16 U. C. C. P. 247.

[a] Construction of award.—Where an administrator submitted to arbitration disputed accounts of his intestate, binding himself and his heirs to abide and perform the award, an award ordering him to pay a specified sum "out of the estate of said deceased" only bound him to pay out of that fund as much as he could pay creditors of the estate,[34] and also upon the heirs and devisees.[35] As against the representative it has been held that if he covenants to abide by and pay the amount of the award he will be personally bound for the full amount awarded,[36] although in form he covenanted as representative,[37] unless from a fair construction of the articles of submission a contrary intention appears;[38] but in the absence of such an agreement he is bound only in his representative capacity and according to the amount of assets.[39] The submission is an implied promise to pay from the assets in his hands and no further promise is necessary to sustain an action on this award.[40] As between different creditors, an award in favor of one does not entitle him to any priority of payment over other creditors but merely establishes and liquidates the claim.[41]

[§ 1091] (5) Revocation of Submission. A wrongful revocation of the submission gives rise to a cause of action against the executor or administrator in his individual and not in his representative capacity.[42]

[§ 1092] b. Reference—(1) Authority to Refer.[43] There are in many jurisdictions statutory provisions expressly authorizing a submission of disputed claims to referees[44] or auditors.[45] These statutes are designed merely to afford an expeditious and inexpensive method of determining such claims,[46] and do not preclude the right of the parties to resort to arbitration[47] or to an ordinary action at law,[48] nor do they make it the duty of either party to offer to refer.[49]

[§ 1093] (2) What Claims May Be Referred. Only such claims may be referred as the statutes permitting the reference authorize.[50] Statutes providing generally for a reference of all claims against the estate cover all claims of whatever nature which the representative is competent to settle and adjust[51] and which have been rejected or disputed by him;[52] and so include claims not yet due,[53] claims of an equitable as well as of a legal nature,[54] and claims arising out of tort as well as out of contract.[55] But claims within the meaning of the statutes comprise only such as accrued during the life of decedent or would have accrued against him if he had lived.[56] An individual claim of the representative against the estate may be referred,[57] but it is otherwise as to a claim of the representative as such.[58]

[§ 1094] (3) Refusal to Refer. Either the representative or the claimant may refuse to refer a disputed claim upon an offer to refer made by the other party,[59] but the probate court has no discretion to refuse a reference where the representa-consistently with the law and rights of other creditors, such being the clear intention of the parties. McKeen v. Oliphant, 18 N. J. L. 442.

tive and claimant mutually agree thereto.[60] Neither party can be said to have refused to refer until the other has in some way manifested his willingness to do so,[61] but a neglect to answer an offer or proposition to refer might be deemed a refusal.[62]

[§ 1095] (4) Agreement to Refer—(a) Form and Requisites. In the case of a statutory reference, although the offer to refer may be by parol,[63] the agreement itself must be in writing,[64] and must be submitted to the surrogate or probate judge for approval,[65] and filed in the clerk's office.[66] The agreement to refer should substantially present the issues between the parties,[67] but matters of defense need not be set up therein.[68]

[§ 1096] (b) Effect. An agreement to refer and the filing of such agreement in the office of the clerk operate as a voluntary appearance by the parties,[69] and also as a waiver of the right to have the matter in dispute tried by a jury.[70] The agreement confers power on the probate court to appoint a referee to adjust the matters in dispute, and the parties cannot thereafter object to such reference.[71] It is not, however, an admission by the representative of sufficient assets to pay the claim,[72] nor is an offer to refer made by a representative after a refusal to pay a claim a waiver of the statute of limitations, unless the offer is accepted before the claim is barred and there is an actual submission as proposed.[73]

[§ 1097] (5) Nature of Proceeding. The statutory reference has been said to be not an action but a special proceeding,[74] but it is a judicial proceeding terminating in a judgment,[75] and is substantially a suit.[76] Such a reference may have, under statute, the same standing as a reference in an action in the supreme court.[77]

[§ 1098] (6) Waiver of Defects. Statutory provisions which are not jurisdictional but relate merely to matters of procedure may be waived by the parties,[78] and where the court has jurisdiction of the subject matter the voluntary appearance of the parties confers jurisdiction of their persons and is a waiver of all irregularities in the prior proceedings.[79] But the representative by consenting to refer does not waive the objection that the claim was not referable under the statute.[80]

[§ 1099] (7) Selection and Appointment of Referees. Under some of the statutes the selection of the referees is made by the parties agreeing to the reference as a part of their agreement and then submitted to the probate court for approval,[81] and the probate judge cannot make the selection unless the parties have failed to agree and consent to accept such persons as he may select,[82] or one of the referees selected refuses to serve,[83] or the report of the first referees is rejected and the claim is referred to new referees.[84] Under other statutes the selection is made by the probate judge[85] upon notice to all persons who may be affected by the proceedings.[86] The number of referees is ordinarily specified by statute,[87] but the parties may agree to the appointment of a different number,[88] or that the probate judge shall himself act as referee.[89]

[§ 1100] (8) Powers of Referees. The referees possess only such powers as are expressly conferred or may be fairly inferred from the provisions of the statute authorizing the reference.[90] They do not possess the same powers as referees in ordinary actions[91] unless such powers are expressly conferred by statute.[92]

The court may revoke an order of reference while the reference is pending, upon proof of facts which might render further proceedings before the referees fraudulent or injurious to the rights of persons interested in the claim referred or in the estate,[93] and may do so on the application of one who is not a party to the reference and against the consent of those who are parties thereto.[94]

[§ 1102] (10) Bringing in of New Parties and Intervention. If while the reference is pending it appears that the presence of other persons is necessary to a complete determination of the controversy the court may order them to be brought in and made parties.[95] But a legatee cannot intervene in a proceeding on a disputed claim against the estate, which has been referred and has assumed the status of an action in the supreme court, on the ground of collusion between the administrator and the claimant, and consequent danger to his legacy.[96]

[§ 1103] (11) Proceedings before Referee. The hearing on a statutory reference may be conducted without filing any pleadings,[97] the agreement to refer supplying the place of both pleadings and process;[98] but notice of the time of the hearing should be given.[99] The hearing must be confined strictly to the particular claim referred,[1] and the claimant must satisfy the referees of its justice and validity.[2] Any defense may be urged which is available to defeat the claim,[3] including the statute of limitations,[4] and every species of legal proof adapted to show the injustice or invalidity of the claim in whole or in part is admissible.[5] It is not necessary that the testimony taken on the hearing before the referees should be signed and filed.[6] On a hearing before an auditor, an issue to try a disputed question of fact before a jury may, it has been held, be demanded,[7] although such an issue is not a matter of right on every disputed claim, but it must be shown that there exists some disputed fact, for the determination of which a jury is necessary.[8]

[§ 1104] (12) Findings, Award, or Report. The only finding which the referee is authorized to make is that the claim in question be allowed or disallowed,[9] and he cannot, after rejecting the claim, make an affirmative finding in favor of the estate against claimant,[10] unless the court directs him, as it may do, on his report that the claim is unfounded, and on application of the representative, to report on any claim in favor of the estate against claimant.[11] The award is a nullity as to any finding by the referees which is in excess of their authority,[12] but if that part of their award, which is within the scope of their authority, is independent of and clearly distinguishable from the rest, it may be affirmed as to that part and rejected as to the balance.[13] A report finding the claim invalid is in the nature of a nonsuit, and does not require any special findings of fact.[14]

[§ 1105] (13) Return and Approval of Report. In the absence of a statute giving the reference the same standing as a reference in an action and authorizing judgment to be entered upon the report,[15] the report of the referees must be returned to and approved by the court before judgment can be entered thereon,[16] the return being made not to the surrogate or probate judge who approved the selection of the referees but to the court of general jurisdiction in which the rule for their appointment was entered.[17] On presentation of the report the court may either set it aside or accept it and render judgment thereon,[18] but the findings of a referee or auditor upon questions of fact will be sustained unless they are clearly contrary to the evidence,[19] or unless there is an absence of evidence sufficient in law to sustain them.[20] If the report is rejected, the court may appoint new referees and resubmit the claim to them,[21] or if the report is merely defective in form it may be sent back to the same referee for correction.[22] It has been held that if the report is not accepted the court cannot substitute its own finding for that which the referee should have made and render judgment thereon,[23] but there is also authority for the view that the court, on return of the report, may set it aside and make findings of fact and law of its own from the evidence.[24] The statutes as to the time within which referees appointed in ordinary actions must make and deliver their report do not apply to a statutory reference of a disputed claim.[25]

[§ 1106] (14) Effect of Award. It has been held that the award is equivalent to a judgment and can be attacked only for fraud or collusion,[26] and is binding upon the heirs, although they were not parties to the proceeding;[27] and also that a judgment entered on the report of the referee is equivalent to a judgment by confession.[28]

[§ 1107] (15) Second Reference.[29] The granting of a second reference for newly discovered evidence is a matter resting largely in the discretion of the court.[30]

[§ 1108] c. Hearing before Commissioners. In some jurisdictions provision is made by statute for the appointment of commissioners to pass upon disputed claims,[31] and a court of chancery may in a suit against the representative appoint commissioners to ascertain and report upon claims against the estate.[32] The commissioners, although in a sense they act judicially, are not strictly speaking a court,[33] but are appointed to act in a particular case only, after which their authority ceases.[34] Under a statute providing that where claims are deemed by the executor or administrator to be exorbitant, unjust, or illegal, commissioners may be appointed to determine the claims and that "no action shall be maintained on any claim so committed unless proved before said commissioners," the word "maintained" refers to the prosecution to a conclusion of an action already begun.[35] The hearing should be had on notice to the parties interested,[36] but may be conducted without formal pleadings,[37] and any objections and defenses may be interposed which would be available in an action on the claim.[38] The evidence taken before the commissioners should be returned to the probate court.[39] Exceptions to the report are in the nature of special demurrers, and must specifically point out the errors complained of.[40] The commissioners have no

35. Shurtleff v. Redlon, 109 Me. 62, 67, 82 A 645 ("It is, however, urged most strenuously that the word 'maintained' as used in R. S., c. 66 § 54 is equivalent to commenced or brought. It is true that this is, perhaps, the ordinary meaning of the word in legal phraseology but it is not always so used in our statutes, as in R. S., c. 84, § 146, we find 'bring and maintain,' in R. S., c. 83, § 108, 'brought or maintained' and R. S. c. 107 § 16, 'commenced or maintained' where the word means something more than begin or institute and the meaning is fairly equivalent to prosecute what has been begun. See also R. S., c. 89, §§ 4, 6, 9, 14. It is apparent that the word maintain is used in three meanings; to commence, Burbank v. Auburn, 31 Me. 590, 591; to commence and prosecute to a conclusion, Kinsey v. Ohio Southern R. Co., 3 OhS&CP 249, 250, 2 OhNP 175 and to prosecute to a conclusion that which has already been begun: Smith v. Lyon, 44 Conn. 175, 178. The court is of the opinion that as used in R. S., c. 66, § 54, the word maintain means to prosecute to a conclusion an action already begun and that the inhibition was inserted out of abundant caution to more clearly differentiate proceedings upon such claims from those against insolvent estates where, as we have seen, the commencement of suits is forbidden after a decree of insolvency. To inhibit the commencement of an action after the claim is duly and legally committed to the commissioners by decree of the Probate Court is unnecessary in view of the fact that the report of the commissioners is made final saving only the right of appeal; R. S., c. 66, § 54").

jurisdiction of claims in behalf of the estate except as offsets to adversary claims.[41] An appeal will lie from the decision of commissioners,[42] but their adjudication as to matters within their authority is final and conclusive unless appealed from,[43] and unless the appeal is prosecuted according to the requirements of the statute.[44] It is sometimes provided that if a claim is not paid within thirty days after the report of the commissioners is accepted, claimant may file a copy of the report in the office of the clerk of the court and execution may be issued thereon.[45] A commissioner who is directed to take proof on a number of contested claims is not entitled to compensation for separate reports on the several claims.[46]

[§ 1109] d. Proceedings in Probate Court—(1) Probate Jurisdiction as to Disputed Claims[47]—(a) Rule in Absence of Statute. In the absence of statute probate courts have no jurisdiction to try and determine disputed claims against an estate,[48] even with the consent of the parties;[49] and where the same court is both a court of probate and a court of general jurisdiction, it cannot while sitting as a court of probate try disputed claims, but a suit must be brought on the civil side of the docket.[50] As soon as a claim is disputed the jurisdiction of the probate court over it is suspended until its validity is established in another forum,[51] and any proceedings then pending in the probate court to enforce its payment should be dismissed.[52] By a disputed claim, however, is meant one which is disputed by the representative and not a claim which an heir, legatee, or other person interested in the estate may deem unfounded or unjust;[53] and where the claim has been allowed by the representative its validity may be passed upon by the probate court if on the settlement of the representative's accounts it is disputed by some person interested in the estate.[54] The probate court may also determine whether the claim was ever presented to the representative,[55] and whether it was allowed or rejected by him.[56]

"It [the orphans' court] had no power to determine the rights of the claimant against the estate, or to order the payment of the claim, and its order dismissing the petition did not affect the appellee's right to enforce his claim in a Court of law or equity." Houck v. Houck, 112 Md. 122, 131, 76 A 581.

[a] Where the validity of a judgment debt is disputed, the surrogate's court has no jurisdiction to determine questions as to its validity, although it may pass upon any payments made and determine the balance due and may also determine who is the owner of the judgment and entitled to the money. or is necessarily incident to the proper exercise of duties directly imposed.[58] Under statutes conferring jurisdiction on probate courts to pass upon disputed claims[59] they may determine simple demands whether of a legal or equitable nature,[60] but as to matters of purely equitable cognizance they have no jurisdiction,[61] and such cases must be decided either by an amicable reference or by a bill in equity.[62]

[§ 1111] (c) Statutory Jurisdiction. In a number of the states jurisdiction to try disputed claims has been conferred upon probate courts by statute.[63] Under some statutes this jurisdiction is limited and can be exercised only under certain circumstances or as to particular classes of claims,[64] and in such cases the statute will be strictly construed and held to confer no new jurisdiction other than that clearly provided.[65]

Counterclaims of estate. The jurisdiction of the probate court to determine claims against the estate sometimes carries with it jurisdiction to adjudicate upon counterclaims or cross demands of the estate against claimant,[66] and in case the claim of the estate exceeds that of the claimant, to give judgment against claimant for the excess.[67]

Equity will not control the probate court in its province of determining and adjudicating questions of the allowance or disallowance of claims against estates of decedents.[68]

[§ 1112] (d) Claims of Representative. In some states jurisdiction is conferred by statute upon probate courts to pass upon claims of the representative against the estate which he represents,[69] and under such statutes the court may pass upon claims of an equitable as well as a legal nature.[70] The probate court may also pass upon a claim of the representative under statutes giving it jurisdiction to determine claims of creditors presented on an application to sell real estate.[71] But in the absence of statute the general rule as to lack of jurisdiction to determine disputed claims applies to claims of the representative.[72]

[§ 1113] (2) Nature of Proceeding. Proceedings in the probate court for the trial and determination of disputed claims are usually summary.[73] It has been said that the proceeding is neither an action at law nor a suit in equity but is distinctively statutory and sui generis,[74] and is not governed by the technical rules of pleading, procedure, evidence, and the like which apply to formal suits at law,[75] unless the statute makes the rules of procedure in civil cases apply.[76] In the absence of statute the proceeding need not be formally entitled but an entitling or description which will identify it is sufficient.[77]

[§ 1114] (3) Defenses. Whatever would be a good defense in an ordinary suit on a claim is equally good in a proceeding to establish the claim in the probate court,[78] and equitable, as well as legal defenses, may be interposed;[79] but where the claim presented is based upon a judgment, it cannot be defeated by matters which might have been interposed as a defense to the action in which the judgment was rendered.[80] The statute of limitations is a good defense,[81] and is available without being specially pleaded.[82]

[§ 1115] (4) Parties. The heirs are not necessary party defendants to proceedings to establish ordinary claims against the estate.[83] Where a note given by decedent was assignable, it is not necessary that the original payee, who has assigned it, should be made a party to proceedings for its collection from the estate.[84] In a proceeding for the allowance of a claim against the estate, based on the ground that obligors in a bond, for the purpose of indemnifying themselves, had created a fund which was deposited with decedent, who agreed to invest the same, pay the interest thereon annually to the obligors, protect them on their obligation, and pay to them the part of the fund remaining on the discharge of the obligation, all the obligors were indispensable parties,[85] especially where it did not appear that the conditions under which the obligors would become entitled to the fund had been complied with.[86]

[§ 1116] (5) Citation, Notice, and Appearance. Where proceedings are instituted in the probate court to establish a disputed claim, notice must be given to the representative,[87] but this requirement will be deemed to be waived if he appears and contests the claim upon its merits[88] or consents to a continuance.[89] In the case of a claim of the representative against the estate, notice should be given to the heirs who are of age.[90] Where the notice of hearing required by statute was not given, the failure of the claimant to appear was excusable.[91]

[§ 1117] (6) Docketing Claims. Claims filed against the estate but not admitted by the representative cannot be tried without his consent until there has been a compliance with a statute requiring that such a claim shall be filed and placed on the appearance docket of the court ten days before the first day of the term, and if it is not admitted by the executor or administrator before the last day of the term it shall be transferred to the issue docket for trial at the following term.[92]

[§ 1118] (7) Pleadings. Proceedings in the probate court for the trial and determination of disputed claims are ordinarily conducted without formal pleadings,[93] it being sufficient for claimant to merely file a succinct statement of his claim.[94] The claim should be presented in writing,[95] but need not conform to the technical requirements of a complaint,[96] or contain a formal demand for judgment of any kind,[97] and is sufficient if it apprises defendant of the nature and amount of the claim and shows enough to bar another action for the same demand.[98] A demurrer is not ordinarily the proper mode of questioning the sufficiency of the statement of a claim,[99] although it is sometimes permitted by statute to test the sufficiency of the statement or any subsequent pleading in this manner.[1] An administrator who goes to trial on the merits waives his right to move to require claimant to make his claim more definite and certain.[2] The resistance of defendant, without a written answer, puts in issue all matters upon which a defense to the claim could be based, usually set up by a general denial,[3] and no matters need be specially pleaded unless required by statute.[4] If, however, a party elects to file a formal written plea

in a proceeding of this kind he must, it is held, conform to the rules of pleading.[5]

Verification of answer. Where a promissory note purporting to have been made by a decedent is filed as a claim against his estate, the answer of the administrator denying the execution of the instrument need not be sworn to in order to put plaintiff to proof of its execution.[6]

Amendment. If the statement is insufficient claimant should be allowed to amend by filing a more full and particular statement,[7] but the claim cannot be enlarged by amendment,[8] and an amendment may be denied if the effect would be to cause a continuance and it relates to a distinct claim which need not be determined in the same proceeding.[9]

[§ 1119] (8) Issues, Proof, and Variance. In an action upon a rejected claim, claimant can recover only upon the cause of action set forth in the claim.[10] It has been held that where objection is made to a claim for services on the sole ground that claimant was fully paid in decedent's lifetime, this is the only issue open for consideration,[11] but it has also been considered that where the only pleadings consist of the claim and a denial thereto, all matters of defense, except set-off and counterclaim, may be given in evidence.[12] A claim, alleging a written agreement of decedent to pay plaintiff a certain sum in consideration of the conveyance by a third person of a tract of land, is not supported by proof of a parol agreement to that effect.[13] Where a claim against decedent's estate for funeral expenses was not challenged in the statement of defenses by defendant's counsel as extravagant considering decedent's wealth and position in life, evidence that the interment was extravagant was not within the issues.[14] Where decedent's relatives before his death procured the appointment of a committee for him, and treated the committee as trustee, on the hearing of decedent's sister's claim against his estate for caring for him, defended on the ground that the services were covered by her husband's contract with the committee, no question could be raised as to the legality of the committee's appointment.[15] Where a claim for work is resisted only on the ground that the whole amount of work alleged was not performed, claimant is not bound to prove the value of the work.[16] It is not a material variance that the claim on a guarantee of notes merely described the notes as signed by a certain person and guaranteed by decedent, which was correct as far as it went, and the notes, when produced, showed also the names of other indorsers.[17] Neither is there a variance between a claim presented for services as a clerk for a certain period at twenty dollars per week, with a credit amounting to seven dollars per week for such period, and proof of employment of plaintiff by deceased at twenty dollars per week, plaintiff to draw seven dollars per week, and leave the balance with deceased with which to furnish a house which was to have been built for plaintiff, the money not being held under a trust, but still being owed for services.[18] It has also been held that the fact that the claim stated a definite sum did not prevent a recovery of the reasonable value of the services enumerated, the claim being equally consistent with the recovery upon an express contract or an implied contract for reasonable value.[19] But it has been held that no recovery could be had on a claim for services where the notice of claim specified an agreement different from that relied on at the trial.[20]

[§ 1120] (9) Evidence—(a) Presumptions and Burden of Proof. There is no legal presumption that a decedent was indebted at the time of his death, and the burden of proving the existence of such indebtedness is upon the party asserting it,[21] but where a widow puts in a claim against her husband's estate for moneys admitted to have been paid out by her at the husband's request, out of her separate property, as premiums on policies on must be pleaded, and that any defense showing matter of excuse, discharge, or release, or any defense which by some other matters seeks to avoid the legal effect of facts alleged, must be specially pleaded, on a claim against decedent's estate for services rendered, evidence that claimant intended that the services should be gratuitous was inadmissible, where such claim was not specially pleaded. his life, the burden is upon the executor to show that the moneys were a gift to decedent.[22] Where an indebtedness is evidenced by a bond or note, the creditor need not prove that it has not been paid but the burden of proving payment or other matter in discharge is upon the opposite party,[23] and the same is true where the existence of an indebtedness at one time is otherwise established[24] or admitted.[25] Where the execution of a note, filed as a claim against the estate, and the genuineness of the maker's signature are in issue, the burden of proof is on claimant as to these matters.[26] Where a judgment against decedent was entered after his death, the burden of showing that he died before jurisdiction was acquired by the court, through the filing of a bond on appeal from a justice's court, is on the personal representative.[27] Where a claim is based on a receipt for money paid for decedent during his lifetime, it will be presumed that it was paid by claimant as the agent of decedent and not with funds advanced by him, where the form of the receipt is consistent with such payment;[28] and, where the representative pays outstanding debts against the estate, it will be presumed that he did so as representative, and if he claims to have advanced money therefor, the burden is upon him to show this fact, and also the amount actually paid.[29]

Claims admitted or allowed by representative. A claim which has been allowed or admitted by the representative is usually regarded as prima facie valid so that the burden of proving its invalidity is upon the party opposing it,[30] although it has been held otherwise where the opposition was by parties other than the representative.[31] If the admission of the claim is denied by the representative the burden is upon claimant to show that it was admitted.[32]

Claims for services rendered. Ordinarily the fact that services were rendered a decedent at his request or with his approval raises a presumption that they were to be paid for,[33] but where claimant was a member of decedent's immediate family it will be presumed that the services were gratuitous, and the burden is upon claimant to show the contrary.[34] In the case of claims for domestic services, it will be presumed that wages were regularly paid when due, or that it was understood that no compensation was to be made,[35] and where a servant makes a claim for extra compensation for acting as nurse and housekeeper for decedent, but admits that she received the compensation at which she was originally employed, it is incumbent upon her to show some agreement, express or implied, for extra compensation.[36] With respect to board and nursing it has been considered that in the absence of an express contract the law will presume that periodical payments were made where the decedent was in receipt of an income.[37] Where a person employed as sick nurse claims to have rendered additional services in other capacities, no recovery can be had on a quantum meruit, unless their value be satisfactorily proved.[38]

Due presentation of claim. The burden of proving due presentation of the claim is on claimant.[39]

Want of consideration. It is incumbent on the representative to prove want of consideration where he relies on this to defeat the claim.[40]

creates a strong presumption against its validity,[41] particularly where the claim was not asserted in the lifetime of the alleged debtor.[42]

[§ 1121] (b) Admissibility. In a proceeding to establish a disputed claim it is competent to inquire into all the facts and circumstances having a tendency to prove or disprove the existence or validity of the claim.[43] So where the claim is based on an alleged loan to decedent, evidence is admissible of the financial condition of the parties,[44] or of the fact that at the time of the alleged loan claimant was indebted to decedent.[45] Where a claim was for personal services, an attempt of the decedent to make a will in which claimant was a beneficiary has been held admissible as showing an intent to compensate plaintiff.[46] Evidence which is not relevant or material to the particular facts in issue,[47] or which tends to raise a new or collateral issue, is not admissible.[48] Evidence of a demand on decedent's husband, in decedent's presence, for payment for services to decedent is immaterial.[49] It is not competent to show in support of a claim for services to decedent that before the employment decedent had endeavored to make claimant a beneficiary in an insurance policy,[50] and where the claim is for funeral expenses, evidence as to the wholesale cost of caskets like that furnished by claimant

[a] Illustration.—On the trial of a claim by a married woman against the estate of a decedent, evidence of a conversation between claimant and her husband by which they agreed that she should receive compensation for her services to the decedent as her own property, was admissible where it was shown that there was an arrangement between claimant and decedent known and assented to by the husband, that she should be entitled to the compensation personally and liability to the husband was negatived. Barclay v. Coman, 146 Mich. 650, 110 NW 49.

[b] Offer to sell claim.—Where the claim is based on a note the rightful possession of which is disputed evidence is admissible on the part of the claimant that prior to decedent's death he made repeated and public offers to sell the same, such evidence tending to show that he was asserting it as a claim against decedent in his lifetime. [b] On an issue as to payment of the claim the fact that decedent had money on deposit to the claimant's knowledge is no evidence of payment and is properly excluded. McDowell v. McDowell, 75 Vt. 401, 56 A 98, 98 AmSR 831.

[c] Evidence as to the mental and physical condition of decedent in the latter part of his life is properly excluded where defendant does not offer to show in what manner if any plaintiff took an undue advantage of such condition. Sullivan v. Sullivan, 6 Ind. A. 65, 32 NE 1132.

[d] Where a claim is based on a specific contract for a certain amount for services rendered, evidence of the actual value of the service is immaterial and inadmissible. Matter of Johnson, 32 App. Div. 634, 52 NYS 1081.

[e] In an action on a claim to recover the purchase price of land bought at a sheriff's sale under an execution against the decedent, the deed to which has been set aside, it is error to admit evidence of the amount expended by the purchaser in improvements on the property, since there can be no recovery for improvements, except on a proceeding taken under the occupying claimant law. Westerfield v. Williams, 59 Ind. 221.

Books, papers, and other documents. The usual rules as to the admissibility of documentary evidence apply.[52] Claimant's books of account are admissible in evidence where the claim is based upon an open account,[53] or for services rendered,[54] or, where the claim is based upon a note against the estate which is contested, as a circumstance to show that the note was for the same amount as the books showed to be due.[55] A memorandum against his interest found among the papers of decedent showing a debt due by him is admissible in favor of a party seeking to establish the fact stated,[56] and conversely papers found among the effects of the decedent, the genuineness of which is sufficiently proved, and which tend to show a payment by him of the claim presented, are admissible in evidence.[57] On an issue whether a claim against decedent for a balance due for an interest in a firm purchased by him from claimant is fraudulent, the tax lists for the year preceding and the year of the purchase, showing the amount at which the firm property was listed for taxation, are admissible.[58] It has been held that in the absence of an affidavit denying the execution of notes on which a claim is based against decedent as guarantor, the notes are admissible in evidence without proof of execution.[59] Where a claim is based upon a contract by which a married woman engaged claimant to serve her until her death under an agreement that claimant should be compensated by her will out of her separate estate, the will of the married woman's husband devising property to her, and an inventory of his estate, as well as the will of the married woman, and an inventory of her estate, are admissible in evidence to show that the married woman had separate property and that claimant was not compensated according to the contract.[60] Where a son claims against the estate of his father for services, notes executed by the father payable to the son after the father's death and delivered to a third person are admissible in evidence as tending to show the amount which the father intended the son to have;[61] but where, in such case, the court has permitted counsel to show statements made by the son at other times, it is not error to exclude prior claims not verified, presented to, or filed with the commissioners.[62] A paper executed by the decedent which is testamentary in its nature is not admissible, unless it has been admitted to probate.[63] Where a claim is based on a note, checks of decedent dated prior to the making of the note are inadmissible as evidence of payment thereof.[64]

Declarations and admissions. The usual rules as to the admissibility of admissions and declarations apply.[65] Evidence of declarations of decedent has been held admissible on an issue as to whether services were understood as being gratuitous or for compensation,[66] and evidence that the claim was previously presented for a smaller amount is admissible as an admission on the part of the claimant as to the amount rightfully due.[67] So also the admissions of decedent may be accepted as furnishing a fair measure of his actual indebtedness for board

[a] Declaration throwing light on relation of parties.—In an action by a son against his father's estate for services rendered, evidence that the father stated to witness that if he did as the son did witness would win out, that the son had worked for many years without drawing much money, and that he would undoubtedly some time own the business, was admissible as throwing light on the relation of the parties. Hialey v. Hailey, 157 Mich. 45, 121 NW 465.

[b] Declarations not communicated to claimant.—Where an uncle devised a house valued at five thousand dollars to his nephew, who presented a claim against the estate for sixteen thousand dollars for services rendered for a period of twenty-one years, based on an alleged oral agreement that he would be paid therefor by the last will of his uncle at his death, expressions of an intent by the uncle to compensate the nephew, made in conversation with third persons during some fifteen or twenty years, are no part of the contract where it was not shown that they were communicated to the nephew to induce him to render the services and that he performed in consideration thereof. Matter of Duke, 57 Misc. 541, 109 NYS 1087, 6 Mills Surr. 541.

[c] Self-serving declaration. — In a daughter's action against her father's estate for services rendered for him in his lifetime, under an alleged promise to compensate her therefor in his will, by devising certain property to her, any statement made by decedent that he did not consider himself indebted to plaintiff for her services, made out of plaintiff's presence, was a self-serving declaration, and was not admissible. [§ 1122] (c) Weight and Sufficiency—aa. In General. While the uncontradicted testimony of a single witness, whose competency or credibility is not impeached, is sufficient, if believed, to establish a claim against a decedent's estate,[69] unless corroboration is required by statute,[70] the general rule is that claims should be established by very satisfactory evidence, and that such claims and the evidence adduced to support them should be carefully scrutinized so as to prevent, as far as possible, the allowance of unjust or fictitious demands.[71] This

[a] Limitations of rule.—"We are urged by appellant's counsel to remember in approaching this question that claims such as the one at bar are easy to make and hard to disprove; that the only witness who could specifically deny the alleged modification, establish nonperformance of the agreement, or show that full compensation had been made, is dead; that no defense is possible save as it may be found in the improbability of the stories of the plaintiff's witnesses when tested by comparison with other evidence in the case or by ordinary rules of human conduct under similar circumstances. In so far as this admonition implies that courts generally should scrutinize with more than usual care the quality of the proof presented in such cases, assent may be given; and, in so far as the proof consists of oral declarations of the deceased, caution was enjoined upon the trial court and jury by the statute. (Rev. Codes, sec. 8028; Escallier v. Great Northern R. Co., 46 Mont. 238, 127 P 458, AnnCas1914B 468.) We can find, however, no authority in our Code for the application of any different rule as to the quantum of proof from the one prescribed for civil action generally or for the assertion that this court may or should employ any different canons of review from those which obtain in other actions at law. The jury, who were the judges of the weight and credibility of the testimony, the trial judge, who, if he thought the verdict contrary to the weight of the evidence, could have set it aside, have expressed their satisfaction with the respondent's contention. It is to be presumed that they exercised all the caution and scrutiny enjoined upon them by the law, and it is not to be supposed that they were any the less solicitous for the integrity of decedents' estates than are we. The question before us is, therefore, the same as in other appeals in actions at law, viz., whether there is any substantial evidence to support the verdict of the jury." Gauss v. Trump, 48 Mont. 92, 98, 135 P 910.

rule is very strictly applied where the proof consists of parol evidence as to admissions or declarations of decedent,[72] and in cases where the claim is made by the personal representative,[73] and where the only evidence in support of the claim is the testimony of the claimant himself.[74] A mere receipt for money is not sufficient to establish the existence of a debt,[75] nor is a book account of sums of money lent to a person since deceased sufficient in the absence of other evidence, to support a claim therefor against decedent's estate.[76] So also a due bill signed by decedent, and found among his private papers after his death, is not alone sufficient evidence of a debt, although it may be so when coupled with confidential instructions, oral and written, to his executor to pay it.[77]

Corroboration of claimant. In the absence of statute the uncorroborated testimony of the claimant may be sufficient to establish his claim, if the court is entirely satisfied as to its truthfulness,[78] there being no absolute rule of law that corroboration is necessary;[79] but it is sometimes provided by statute that a disputed claim cannot be established by the testimony of the claimant alone,[80] and in any event the uncorroborated testimony of the claimant is not sufficient as a matter of law.[81]

[a] Extent of corroboration required.—"The testimony of the respondent as to the reasons for the delay was not corroborated by other testimony; but, in my opinion, it was not necessary that it should have been, as his testimony as to the main question, the making of the agreement, was so corroborated, and the corroboration which the statute requires is not corroboration of every material fact which is required to be proved in order to entitle the party to succeed, but only of such material facts as lead to the conclusion that the testimony of the party is true." McGregor v. Curry, 31 Ont. L. 261, 270, 5 OntWN 90, 25 OntWR 58, 6 OntWN 202, 20 DomLR 706 [aff (Can.) 25 DomLR 771].

[b] Where there are two joint claimants, the fact that they both testified to substantially the same thing is not the corroboration which the statute requires. Taylor v. Regis, 26 Ont. 483.

[c] An instruction that the jury cannot rely on claimant's testimony alone, and, if he comes into court without any evidence except his own, he cannot recover, and that while he is a competent witness he cannot prevail unless he proves his case by other competent evidence, is sufficient against the objection that it admits a recovery on claimant's own testimony. Bull v. Payne, 47 Or. 580, 84 P 697.

[d] Documentary evidence introduced by claimant may suffice without corroboration. Brocklebank v. Barter, 8 Alta. L. 262.

Stale claims are regarded with special disfavor, and require very strong and conclusive testimony to establish them,[82] particularly where the claim was never asserted in decedent's lifetime.[83]

[§ 1123] bb. Claims for Services. To establish a claim for services, proof of an express contract is not in all cases essential,[84] but claimant must show either an express contract or an implied agreement or mutual understanding that the services were to be paid for,[85] by clear and satisfactory proof;[86] and where there is no express contract the facts showing an implied contract or mutual understanding must be fairly established.[87] The existence or nonexistence of such an implied agreement or mutual understanding may be established from the circumstances of the particular

[a] Illustration.—A claim against a decedent's estate for services rendered on a farm will not be sustained, where claimant does not show any contract, nor what the services were, nor when, where, or under what circumstances they were rendered. In such a case declarations by decedent to third persons that claimant had worked for him and that he owed him money, but without stating how much he owed, are insufficient to support the claim. Riemensberger's Est., 29 Pa. Super. 596, 598 ("Claims for services against a decedent's estate must be established by evidence other than that of mere loose declarations, and must be such as to clearly and distinctly establish a contract, whether express or implied, between the claimant and the decedent").

[b] Contract to compensate by will.—"Such contracts are dangerous in character, easily fabricated, may carry with them a long and silent account of many years' standing; and, therefore, they should be definite and certain and clearly proved by satisfactory evidence." case,[88] as by proof of the character of the services rendered,[89] particular relations between the parties, as of friendship[90] or obligation,[91] the financial condition of the parties,[92] or proof of whether similar services previously performed were gratuitous or for compensation;[93] but no general rule can be laid down applicable to all cases as to what facts and circumstances are sufficient to show the existence or nonexistence of such agreement or understanding.[94] Particularly strong and convincing proof is required where the claim is stale,[95] or where the services extended over a considerable period and no demand for compensation was ever made during decedent's lifetime,[96] or where there are any circumstances connected with the claim tending to render it improbable or suspicious.[97] Since services rendered a decedent by a member of his immediate family, or a person living with him as such, are presumed to be gratuitous,[98] the proof in such cases must be sufficient to overcome this presumption;[99] but in an action by a husband and wife to recover for services rendered the wife's deceased grandmother, a letter written by the wife stating that she did not expect to come into possession of anything when the grandmother died does not, as a matter of law, estop her from claiming compensation for her services.[1] A statement in an instrument executed by intestate, giving his niece a certain sum, that it was in "consideration of her care and attention during my sickness" has been held prima facie evidence, in an action thereon against the estate, that he received the care and attention stated therein.[2]

[§ 1124] (10) Hearing. Where objections are filed to the allowance of a claim, the issues presented should be heard by the probate judge,[3] and the matter is pending in his court until it is determined.[4] A hearing on a contested claim is at law and not in equity.[5] The person seeking to establish a claim has the affirmative of the issue and is entitled to open and close the case.[6] A party may introduce his evidence in the order in which he prefers.[7] Under some statutes only proof by deposition can be heard on the final trial.[8] The submission of disputed questions of fact to a jury is discretionary with the probate court,[9] and it may do so of its own motion.[10] Where the trial is had before a jury it is for them to determine whether the family relationship existed between decedent and one claiming compensation for services rendered to him,[11] whether there was contract to pay for the services,[12] and whether claimant is entitled to compensation;[13] and it is also for the jury to determine whether a note was supported by good and sufficient consideration[14] or was obtained by undue influence.[15] Where there was evidence of an agreement by decedent to pay claimant for services rendered without specifying the amount, the agreement being merely to pay him "handsomely and more than any percentage would amount to," it was a question of fact as to what compensation was reasonable in view of the terms as to contract and services rendered.[16] Instructions to the jury should, of course, advise them clearly of the questions properly presented for their consideration and the principles of law applicable thereto.[17]

17. See cases infra this note.

[a] Where there was no material evidence that complainant rendered any services to decedent personally, the court erred in instructing that, if complainant was not a member of decedent's family, and rendered useful services to him in his lifetime, the fact of their rendition was prima facie evidence of their acceptance by him, and, in the absence of proof to the contrary, or of an express contract, raised an obligation to pay what they were reasonably worth. Pearre v. Smith, 110 Md. 531, 73 A 141.

[b] Construction of ambiguous instrument.—On the trial of a disputed claim against the estate of a decedent on an instrument purporting to give plaintiff a certain sum payable by the administrator for the care and attention given intestate during his sickness, signed by intestate, it was error to refuse to charge that if he signed the instrument with intent to bind his estate, but that part of the consideration was love and affection and part for services rendered with the understanding that they should be paid for, the jury could separate the consideration and determine how much was intended for services and how much as a gift, and render a verdict for the value of the services and disallow the remainder, the instrument being ambiguous and subject to such a construction under the evidence. Spencer v. Potter, 85 Vt. 1, 80 A 821.

[c] Instructions not applicable to facts.—In an action against the administrator of a decedent, brought by the husband of a granddaughter of decedent for board furnished him, the refusal of instructions on the subject of gratuitous services to a member of a family was proper, where it appeared that plaintiff was poor, that decedent was possessed of means, and expected to pay and did make payments from time to time, and counsel for the adminis-

[§ 1125] (11) Findings and Decision. Where the proof is insufficient to warrant a judgment for any sum, it is proper to dismiss the claim.[18] On a claim for personal services by decedent's granddaughter, a request for a special finding, whether the relation of grandfather and grandchild changed to that of master and servant was properly refused,[19] as was also a request for a special finding as to when any express contract of employment was entered into where the evidence showed that decedent's promises were continuing.[20] Where, in proceedings to establish a claim for boarding and caring for decedent, there was a general verdict for plaintiff, but in answer to special interrogatories the jury found that claimant had no contract with decedent, and that no amount was promised, and that decedent for a number of years prior to her death lived among her children, of whom claimant was one, such findings were not in irreconcilable conflict with the general verdict, and it was error to enter a judgment for defendant non obstante veredicto.[21]

[§ 1126] (12) Judgment—(a) In General. The judgment rendered in a probate court on the trial of a disputed claim is not a judgment in the technical sense, on which execution may issue,[22] but it simply ascertains whether the claim should be allowed and if allowed it is ordered to be paid from the assets of the estate.[23] Even a formal order of allowance is not necessary, but if the judgment as rendered is such in effect, this is sufficient.[24] The judgment must be for a definite sum [25] which cannot be more than the amount of the claim.[26] Where two persons have, at the audit of an administrator's account, presented distinct claims for services rendered in selling property of decedent, each claiming to have sold the property and to be entitled to compensation, and there being no privity of contract between them, the decree should be separate, and not joint.[27]

[§ 1127] (b) Effect and Conclusiveness. The judgment is a final adjudication as to the validity and amount of the claim,[28] and has the same conclusive force as the judgments of other tribunals,[29] is entitled to the same presumptions as to regularity and validity,[30] and cannot be questioned in a collateral proceeding.[31] It is binding upon the representative,[32] the claimant,[33] the heirs [34] and leg-

[d] Presumption as to payment.—An instruction that if plaintiff never demanded payment during decedent's lifetime for services in caring for and boarding him, it must be presumed that decedent paid for such services, and before the jury could find for plaintiff under such circumstances, they must find that decedent did not pay, was sufficient to protect defendant. Cole v. Waters, 164 Mo. A. 567, 147 SW 552.

[e] It was error to instruct the jury that they could infer that an indebtedness was paid if decedent from time to time during the rendition of services transferred money or property to claimants without disclosing his purpose in making such transfers, regardless of the value of the services rendered or the amount of money or value of property transferred. (2) "A judgment rendered against an executor or administrator upon any claim for money against the estate of his testator or intestate only establishes the claim in the same manner as if it had been allowed by the executor or administrator and the probate judge, and the judgment must be that the executor or administrator pay in due course of administration the amount ascertained to be due." McElroy v. Whitney, 24 Ida. 210, 133 P 118.

[c] Where the claim was not filed within the proper time and can be paid only out of subsequently discovered assets, the judgment should in this regard be special and not general. Russell v. Hubbard, 59 Ill. 335.

[d] Claim certified to circuit court.—On the trial of a claim against a decedent's estate, certified into a circuit court, the judgment for claimant should not award execution, but should be ordered certified to the probate court for classification against the estate. Lipperd v. Lipperd, 181 Mo. A. 106, 163 SW 934.

[e] An amendment to a judgment against an administrator in an action on a claim, by inserting an omitted provision that it must "be paid in due course of administration," did not change the effect of the judgment, since such words were therefore a part of the judgment under the statute. The reasons for which distinction are laid down in Noe v. Moutray, 170 Ill. 169, 48 NE 709. The doctrine has been recently redeclared in Ford v. Stuart First Nat. Bank, 201 Ill. 120, 66 NE 316." atees,[35] and other creditors.[36] So also, where the court, on the trial of a disputed claim against an estate, allowed a set-off outside the issues, but claimant did not appeal, the judgment is conclusive as against him.[37]

[§ 1128] (c) Vacating or Setting Aside. While the power of probate courts to set aside their own orders or judgments allowing claim has been asserted,[38] it has been held that such courts have no jurisdiction to set aside their own adjudications and grant rehearings,[39] at least after the term at which a judgment was rendered.[40] Nor will a court of chancery grant such relief in the absence of a clear showing of fraud or mistake.[41] So an objection that claims presented for allowance in probate proceedings are barred by limitations should be presented before the commissioners or on appeal from their allowance in probate proceedings, and cannot be considered in an action to set aside the probate proceedings,[42] and while the fact that a referee appointed to pass upon a disputed claim allowed an amendment of the claim filed, and that a judgment materially differing from that asked for in the claim was rendered on the amended claim, may be ground for reversing the judgment on appeal, it is not ground for the vacation of such judgment at a subsequent term.[43] Allegations, in a suit to set aside probate proceedings allowing a claim, that claimant wrongfully presented his claim, which was false and fraudulent, and fraudulently procured its allowance by false testimony, are too general to require equitable intervention on the ground of fraud.[44] Where some of the items of a claim presented for allowance were not barred by limitations, the fact that some of them were barred did not oust the probate court of jurisdiction, and was not ground for setting aside the probate proceedings in an action by decedent's heirs against legatees of claimant.[45]

[§ 1129] e. Appeal—(1) Right to Appeal. Appeals from judgments or orders of probate courts allowing or rejecting disputed claims are in most jurisdictions expressly permitted by statute.[46] Where there is a remedy by appeal a suit in equity cannot be maintained to enjoin the enforcement of the probate decree,[47] nor will mandamus lie to compel a probate judge to allow a rejected claim.[48] The decision of a referee under a statutory reference may be reviewed either by a motion for a new trial by way of opposing the motion to confirm the report or by a direct appeal from the judgment entered on the report.[49] The fact that after a commissioner's report of liabilities of the estate, allowing defendant's claim, was filed in an action for administration, other creditors filed petitions asserting claims against the estate, will not prevent

[a] What statute governs.—An appeal from an order rejecting a claim against a decedent's estate will not lie under the general statute providing for appeals, but must be prosecuted under the statute providing for appeals by a party aggrieved by a matter connected with a decedent's estate. Dallam v. Stockwell, 33 Ind. A. 620, 71 NE 911.

[b] An appeal from an order for the hearing of claims generally, made after the appointment of a special and before the appointment of a general administrator, is the appropriate remedy by which to test the validity of such order, and of the allowance of claims thereunder. Jenks v. Black, 96 Mich. 122, 55 NW 563.

[c] Disallowance of claim not a nonsuit.—A judgment disallowing a claim against the estate is not a judgment of nonsuit. "It is and evidently was intended to be a formal judgment of disallowance, and had the same force and effect as a judgment against the claimant that a judgment of allowance of the claim under the same circumstances would have had as against the executor." Hence it is appealable. Tucker v. Tucker, 21 Colo. A. 94, 97, 121 P 125.

[d] Writ of review.—Where it was claimed that the county court exceeded its jurisdiction in allowing the claim of an administrator for money alleged to have been loaned by him to decedent, because the court was prohibited by statute from doing so, the court's order allowing the claim was reviewable by writ of review. Farrow v. Nevin, 44 Or. 496, 75 P 711.

[b] Costs in proceedings on a statutory reference of a claim against a decedent's estate are within the discretion of the court and its decision the administrator from then appealing from a decree confirming the report filed.[50]

[§ 1130] (2) Who May Appeal. Some of the statutes provide that any person who may consider himself aggrieved may appeal,[51] in which case it is not necessary that appellant should be a party of record to the proceedings in the probate court but merely that he should be aggrieved thereby.[52] Under such statutes heirs or distributees are parties interested in the allowance of claims and are entitled to appeal[53] in their own names,[54] although not parties to the record.[55] Under some statutes, however, the executor or administrator alone represents the estate with respect to creditors,[56] and the heirs are not entitled to an appeal with respect to the allowance of a claim[57] unless the representative refuses to take an appeal,[58] in which case the heirs are entitled to control the proceedings without interference from the representative.[59] Where, in the case of claims presented by the representative the court appoints some person to defend the action in the probate court, the estate may appeal, through the person appointed, from an allowance of the claim,[60] and a corepresentative who is also a legatee may in either capacity appeal from the allowance of a claim in favor of the other representative.[61] The representative is a proper party to appeal in behalf of those whose interests he represents from the allowance of the claims of creditors,[62] but creditors whose claims have been rejected must appeal on their own account,[63] since as to them the representative is a party adversely interested.[64] Where there are ample funds to meet any claim which may be allowed, one claimant cannot appeal from a decree allowing the claim of another.[65] Where a claim is disallowed the personal representative cannot appeal.[66]

[§ 1131] (3) From What Action Appeal May Be Taken. A formal entry of judgment is not necessary to authorize an appeal, but any entry which plainly indicates the determination of the probate court to allow or disallow the claim is sufficient.[67]

66. Crenshaw v. Sanford, 14 Ariz. 1, 123 P 31 ("The administrator is not and could not be aggrieved by reason of the judgment of the lower court. 'It is a sound proposition, that administrators, general and special, like receivers and other trustees or custodians of funds for designated purposes, are not ordinarily affected by orders in reference to their disposition, and therefore will not be heard to appeal from such orders.' In re Welch, 106 Cal. 427, 39 P 805; Schlegel v. Sisson, 8 S. D. 476, 66 NW 1087. We conclude that the administrator in this cause has no such interest in the demands of creditors against the estate as to authorize him to appeal from a judgment disallowing such demands. He is fully protected by the judgment of the district court, and ought not be permitted to use the funds of the estate in prosecuting litigation that cannot involve him in liability").

67. Corning v. Ryan, 3 Colo. 525.

Where the probate court allows a portion and disallows the balance of a claim of the same general character, an appeal may be taken from that portion of the order which disallows the claim.[68] An appeal will not lie from an order granting a motion to vacate the allowance of a claim against the estate.[69]

[§ 1132] (4) Time for Taking Appeal. The time within which appeals may be taken is ordinarily prescribed by statute,[70] and if the appeal is not taken within the time limited it may be dismissed on motion,[71] But under the statutes of some states the court may, under certain circumstances, allow an appeal after the regular time has expired.[72] Where the time allowed for taking an appeal had expired, an amendment to the judgment against an administrator, by inserting merely words which the statute would have read into the judgment, did not revive the time so as to renew the right of appeal.[73] Where, after the time has elapsed, leave to appeal from an allowance by the commissioners is sought on the ground of accident or mistake, the petitioner cannot complain that the court in that proceeding determined the merits of his defense,[74] and it cannot be presumed that the lower court did not consider the averments of the verified petition because the finding stated that, except from the petition, it did not appear whether the petitioner believed the claim to be just or unjust.[75]

[§ 1133] (5) Jurisdiction on Appeal. The fact that appellee, the claimant, does not enter an appearance in the circuit court on an appeal from the allowance of a claim in the probate court does not deprive the circuit court of jurisdiction.[76] Where defendant, in an action to establish a claim against an estate, entered upon trial in the district court on appeal without objecting to that court's jurisdiction on the ground that the probate court did not have jurisdiction to try the issue involved, which was the existence of a constructive trust, the objection to the district court's jurisdiction was waived.[77] Where, after disallowance of a claim by the probate court, a paper was filed stipulating the facts, signed by counsel but not authenticated, it could not be considered by the superior court for any purpose, since it was not a certified transcript, and if it was considered as an agreed statement of facts, the jurisdiction passed to the supreme court.[78]

[§ 1134] (6) Allowance of Appeal. An order directing that notice of appeal from a probate decree allowing a claim be served on the administrator by delivering to him a certified copy of the order and application for the appeal, and by serving notice of hearing thereof, is a sufficient order allowing the appeal, although it does not so state in terms.[79] The order allowing the appeal may be made after the time limited by the statute if the application for the order was made before the expiration of this period and appellant was without fault in making and prosecuting it.[80]

[§ 1135] (7) Parties. On an appeal by a creditor from a disallowance of his claim the representative is the only necessary defendant in error and other creditors need not be made parties.[81] But if it appears that another person is jointly liable by contract with decedent on the claim presented such person may be made a party.[82] Where, after disallowance in the probate court, the claim is assigned, the court may permit the assignee to be substituted as claimant on the appeal.[83]

[§ 1136] (8) Notice of Appeal. On an appeal by a claimant from a rejection of his claim process need only be issued to and served upon the representative who is the nominal party to the record, and other persons interested in the estate must take notice of such service.[84] An appeal by some of the creditors from a judgment dismissing all claims cannot be dismissed because of failure to serve notice of the appeal on other claimants whose claims were not of sufficient amount to give them the right to appeal.[85]

[§ 1137] (9) Proceedings for Appeal—(a) In General. The proceedings for taking an appeal from judgments of the probate court are regulated by statute.[86] In some cases it is provided that the appeal shall be taken in the same manner as appeals from a justice of the peace;[87] in others in the same manner as actions are commenced in the court where the appeal is heard;[88] and in still others on a case made and settled by the surrogate as upon an appeal in an ordinary action.[89] Where a probate decree included both of claimant's demands, and recited the allowance of an appeal therefrom, and the cost bond given recited the amount of the two claims in the aggregate as the amount litigated, an objection that the appeal was from separate probate decrees, and that only one was appealed from, cannot be sustained.[90] Where the statute provides that the affidavit for appeal shall be made by "the party aggrieved, his agent or attorney" it is unnecessary that an affidavit by an attorney should show why he makes it.[91]

[§ 1138] (b) Record. The transcript of the record must show all the proceedings in the probate court and contain all the evidence,[92] and must be filed within the time allowed therefor by statute.[93] Where a record shows that an appeal from an allowance against an estate was prayed for and granted to administrators severally or jointly, it is immaterial that only one of the administrators perfected the appeal.[94] It is sometimes required that, on appeal from a probate order allowing a claim against a decedent's estate, a certified copy of the records of the commissioners on claims should be duly filed.[95] Where the practice requires that statements of the nature and amount of a claim filed on appeal from a disallowance thereof by the commissioners appointed by courts of probate shall conform, as far as may be, in form and substance, to the requirements of a complaint on the claim in a civil action, such a statement controls the amount recoverable as fully as the ad damnum clause in a complaint in such an action.[96]

[§ 1139] (c) Bond. On appeal from judgments of the probate court appellant is ordinarily required by statute to give a bond,[97] which must be approved,[98] and filed within the time prescribed by the statute.[99] On an appeal by a creditor from a disallowance of his claim the bond properly runs to the representative.[1] Where the bond required by statute is not given, the appeal should be dismissed,[2] but if the bond is defective the appeal should not be dismissed absolutely in the first instance, but conditionally, in case a new or amended bond is not filed within a reasonable time to be fixed by the court.[3] Under some statutes the personal representative[4] or a person appointed to defend against a demand of the personal representative[5] may appeal without giving a bond.

[§ 1140] (10) Objections and Exceptions. Objections to the allowance of a claim not made in the probate court cannot be urged for the first time on appeal,[6] but will be considered as waived,[7] unless the objection is one which the representative has no right to waive.[8] In the case of an heir appealing from the allowance of a claim where the representative refuses to appeal, it is not necessary, to sustain his right of appeal, that the act of the probate court in allowing the claim should have been objected to.[9]

[§ 1141] (11) Amendment on Appeal. The statutes sometimes permit the statement of claims to be amended on appeal, where this does not change the cause of action,[10] but the court in which an appeal is pending cannot allow an amendment to the original claim adding entirely new items.[11]

[§ 1142] (12) Hearing and Determination. In a number of jurisdictions on appeal from a judgment of a probate court the case is tried de novo,[12] but where the probate court has rendered a judgment adjusting the claims against the estate of a deceased partner and the firm estate, under an agreement authorizing the rendition of a judgment subject to the right to appeal to the circuit court on the evidence taken before the referee appointed by the probate court, the parties on appeal to the circuit court are bound by the agreement, and the circuit court must dispose of the case on the evidence taken before the referee.[13] The trial is usually conducted without filing any formal pleadings,[14] unless required by the court,[15] and no technical form for framing the issues is necessary, the only requirement being that the nature of the controversy shall clearly appear.[16] The issues on appeal must be the same as in the probate court,[17] and

St. § 642 would hold the lands in trust for claimants was permissible, the legal effect of such agreement being that, if he died without performing it, claimants would be entitled to claim the lands, if not sold, or, if they had been sold, their proceeds, and the real object of claimants, as disclosed by either form of expression, being the same. claimant cannot base his right to recover on a theory different from and inconsistent with that asserted in the court below,[18] nor can he present a new and different claim,[19] or enlarge his claim by including new items.[20] A fortiori, claims not presented to the commissioners in the probate court cannot be considered on an appeal from an allowance of other claims.[21] The presumption is in favor of the propriety of the proceedings in the probate court,[22] and a recital in a judgment allowing a claim that the case came on for trial by agreement of the parties is conclusive upon appeal.[23] The action of the probate court will not be interfered with unless it is manifest that there was error[24] which was prejudicial to the complaining party,[25] especially where such action involved the exercise of discretion.[26] A notice of appeal that the residuary legatee appeals from the order allowing the claim does not restrict the appeal to the consideration of the part of the order allowing a certain sum, and prevent any review of that part disallowing a portion of the claim.[27] Where claimant appealed from a judgment allowing his claims in part, but the estate did not appeal from the allowance, and it was not claimed that one of the claims allowed was unjust, the court properly allowed such claim to stand as a part of the verdict and judgment in the case.[28] Where creditors whose claims have been rejected failed to appeal, the judgment appealed from will not be disturbed at the instance of the executor, whose appeal does not bring up their cases.[29] A judgment which is erroneous in reciting that plaintiff shall have and recover a particular amount from the administrator instead of merely adjudging that the administrator paid the amount in due course, need not be reversed, but may be ordered corrected on remittitur,[30] and a judgment sustaining a claim, which is improper only because it orders execution to issue, may be corrected on appeal.[31]

[§ 1143] (13) Order or Judgment. It has been considered that the appellate court may make the order which, in its opinion, the judge of probate should have made.[32] The judgment rendered in the appellate court is not an ordinary judgment against the same manner as if the claim had been disallowed on hearing, and the court should not remand the cause with directions to permit the filing of the claim and to set a day for hearing. Ribble v. Furmin, 71 Nebr. 108, 98 NW 420.

[a] Illustration.—A decree sustaining objections of an administrator to the allowance of claims on the ground that the claims were not probated as required by law will be affirmed where the record does not contain the note or either of the accounts attempted to be probated so that the appellate court has no means of determining whether they are such claims as could be, or have been, legally probated. [a] Thus, where a claim is disallowed on the ground that it is not sufficiently verified and the appellate representative on which execution may be issued, but is merely an allowance or disallowance of the claim which is certified to the probate court,[33] unless the statute makes other provision therefor.[34] The judgment may classify the claims against the estate,[35] but it is not essential to its validity that it should do so.[36] An order for judgment does not necessarily contain the exact language in which the entry of judgment should be made, but the clerk is supposed to understand the order with reference to the case and to make the entry in the proper form.[37] An order on appeal from an order refusing to set aside a judgment on an executor's claim against the estate, providing that "the claim be held in abeyance and not paid or credited until the final report is made by the executor and heard upon notice of hearing to all parties interested," apparently means that there shall be a rehearing on the claim, and if this is the meaning, the order should specifically set aside the allowance of the claim, but should not fix the time when the lower court should hear the claim.[38] Where a claim was allowed in the probate court against an executor and an appeal perfected to the circuit court, which rendered a judgment against the executor, such judgment was only voidable, although the will was set aside, the executor removed, and an administrator appointed before it was rendered.[39] On a writ to review an order of the county court allowing an administrator's claim against the estate, it was error for the circuit court, in reversing the order, to adjudge that the administrator should be charged with interest on a balance in his hands from a certain date, such question being within the jurisdiction of the county court, and its determination thereon not being reviewable on writ of review.[40]

[§ 1144] (14) Dismissal of Appeal. If appellant does not prosecute his appeal it may be dismissed and the judgment of the lower court allowed to stand.[41] But a motion to dismiss the appeal can be made only upon the notice required by the rules of court.[42]

[§ 1145] f. Costs[43]—(1) On Trial in Probate Court. Costs on the trial of disputed claims in probate courts are usually regulated by statute,[44] under which the matter is sometimes confided to the discretion of the court.[45] In the absence of a statute providing expressly for the allowance of costs in such cases it has been held that the equity powers of the court were broad enough to authorize an allowance against the estate of costs necessarily incurred in sustaining a valid claim.[46]

Security for costs may be required under some circumstances.[47]

[§ 1146] (2) On Reference. The costs to be awarded on a statutory reference are regulated by statute,[48] under which costs are sometimes awarded according to the provisions relating to actions against executors and administrators,[49] and by the court holds that the verification is sufficient, it is the duty of the appellate court to render judgment against the estate. Westinghouse Electric, etc., Co. v. Robison, 42 Okl. 754, 142 P 1105.

[a] If the representative is successful in resisting the claim, he is entitled to costs as a matter of referee instead of by the court.[50] The statute sometimes permits the prevailing party on a reference to recover his necessary disbursements.[51]

[§ 1147] (3) Effect of Refusal to Refer. The statutes have sometimes[52] permitted costs to be awarded against the representative and in favor of a successful claimant where the representative refused to submit the claim to a reference.[53]

[§ 1148] (4) Effect of Refusal to Consent to Determination on Accounting. Under a statute allowing the surrogate to pass upon disputed claims by consent of the parties on a judicial settlement of the representative's accounts, costs could be awarded against a representative who did not consent to have the claim so determined,[54] but if the claimant commenced his action before the expiration of the time within which the representative may file such consent he thereby waived his right to costs.[55]

[§ 1149] (5) Effect of Unreasonable Resistance to Claim. Costs cannot be taxed against a representative where it does not appear that his resistance of the claim was unreasonable.[56] But if the claim was unreasonably resisted the representative is chargeable with costs,[57] provided the demand was presented within the time limited by a notice published as prescribed by law,[58] and in such cases the costs may be taxed either against the representative personally or be paid out of the estate as the court, under the circumstances of the particular case, may direct.[59] The rule applies to references as well as to actions.[60] Where the action is in the supreme court the facts showing such unreasonable resistance must be certified by the judge or referee before whom the trial took place,[61] but this requirement does not affect the right of the prevailing party to recover his disbursements.[62] What will amount to an unreasonable resistance depends upon the circumstances of the particular case.[63]

[§ 1150] (6) Costs on Appeal. Under the statutes in some jurisdictions costs on appeal from a judgment of the probate court are within the discretion of the appellate court;[64] and in others the prevailing party may recover his costs against the

[c] On appeal from the decision of commissioners where their allowance is greatly decreased it is proper to apportion the costs. Hatch v. Hatch, 60 Vt. 160, 13 A 791.

other party.[65] Where a claim was allowed, and the contestant, on appealing from the allowance, gave an undertaking as required by statute to pay all damages and costs which might be awarded against him on appeal, and the judgment on appeal was adverse to him, the costs and disbursements of claimant on appeal were properly awarded against the contestant.[66] Where an exception was taken not only to the correctness of the county court's overruling of a motion to dismiss a petition to vacate a report of commissioners allowing a claim, but also to its affirmance of a judgment of the probate court which was in part right and in part wrong, no costs should be allowed.[67]

[§ 1151] D. Priorities and Payment—1. Authority and Duty to Pay. One of the most important duties of the personal representative is the payment of debts which have been legally established against the estate,[68] in their order,[69] and the assets in his hands are primarily chargeable with the payment of such debts,[70] and continue so until the claims are paid[71] or barred by statute.[72] In a broad sense the representative holds decedent's estate as a trust fund for the payment of his debts.[73] Where there is no lien the assets of the estate, real or personal, can as a rule be applied to the payment of the debts only by or through the personal representative unless a contrary provision is made in decedent's will;[74] but it has been held in England that a personal representative may assign the assets to trustees for the benefit of decedent's creditors and that the assignment is valid as against a judgment obtained by a creditor against the representative.[75] Where one is executor or administrator of two estates and becomes possessed of the property of both, it will be presumed that he retains from the assets of one estate an amount due from it to the other estate, whether as a debt or as unliquidated damages.[76]

[§ 1152] 2. Classification and Priorities of Debts—a. What Law Governs.[77] The priorities of debts are governed wholly by the law of the jurisdiction in which the representative acts and from which he derives his authority.[78]

[§ 1153] b. At Common Law—(1) Classification. At common law the proper expenses of the funeral and of proving the will, if one existed, had priority over all debts, and this priority has not been taken away by modern statutes.[79] Apart from these expenses the debts of decedent were, under the common-law system, divided into three main classes: (1) Debts of record; (2) debts by specialty; and (3) debts by simple contract.[80] These were payable in the following order: (1) Debts of record or by specialty due to the crown;[81] (2) other debts of record, such as final judgments rendered against decedent in his lifetime,[82] final decrees of a court of equity being on the same footing;[83] (3) specialty debts, such as debts due on bonds, covenants, and other sealed instruments, when founded on a consideration,[84] and rent in arrear in decedent's lifetime;[85] (4) debts due by simple contract, that is, contracts not under seal, such as bills and notes, and promises resting in parol or implied in law;[86] and (5) specialty debts not founded on a valuable consideration.[87]

Where the assets were sufficient to pay all the debts, it seems that the order of priority was considered immaterial and was not strictly followed.[88]

At the present time the common-law order of classification is observed but little, if at all, the matter of priorities being almost exclusively regulated by statute.[89]

[§ 1154] (2) Preference among Debts of Same Class—(a) Right of Representative to Give Preference. At common law an executor or administrator has the right to pay one creditor of a given class in full, although the assets are insufficient to satisfy the claims of other creditors of the same class.[90] But if a creditor obtains a judgment or decree against the executor or administrator, such creditor must be satisfied before any others of the same class;[91] and after the representative has notice of the commencement of an action at law against him by a creditor he cannot make a voluntary payment to any other creditor of equal degree,[92] although he may give preference to another creditor of equal degree by confessing judgment in his favor.[93] Notice of the commencement of a suit in equity does not, however, have the effect of destroying the representative's right of preference,[94] and he can make a voluntary payment to another creditor of the same class at any time before final decree.[95] If a creditor files a bill in equity against an executor or administrator for the benefit of himself and all other creditors, and a decree is had for an account and distribution, this is in the nature of a decree in favor of all the creditors,[96] and although the legal priorities of creditors are not affected by the decree,[97] the right of a preference among creditors of equal degree is gone.[98]

[§ 1155] (b) Right of Creditor to Obtain Preference. At common law, among creditors of the same class, the one who first reduces his claim to judgment against the personal representative has priority over the others as a reward for his superior diligence;[99] and the same rule applies to decrees in equity against the personal representative.[1] But in order to entitle the creditor to preference his judgment or decree must be final.[2] Judgments or decrees obtained by a creditor against the personal representative do not, however, belong to the same class as judgments recovered against decedent in his lifetime,[3] and a creditor who obtains judgment against the personal representative does not thereby acquire priority over creditors whose claims are of superior dignity to that upon which the judgment is founded.[4] The mere bringing of an action against a personal representative, while it may prevent him from making voluntary payments to other creditors of the same class,[5] does not entitle the creditor bringing the action to any priority over other creditors who may institute actions,[6] but the priority of the claims of the several creditors who institute actions is determined according to the dates of their respective judgments.[7] A decree made for the administration of the estate on a bill in equity filed on behalf of all the creditors operates as a decree in favor of all the creditors, and a subsequent judgment in favor of a single creditor entitles him to no preference with regard to the payment of his claim.[8] A person holding the legal title to land, half of which belongs in equity to decedent, cannot have a debt against decedent satisfied out of the land to the exclusion of other creditors, but must come in equally with them.[9]

[§ 1156] c. Under Modern Statutes—(1) In General. The common-law order of priority still exists in so far as it has not been expressly abrogated or superseded by the local administration laws;[10] but the power of state legislatures to regulate the priorities of claims against decedent's estates is well settled,[11] and the common-law rules have been very generally superseded by statutes, differing widely in the various jurisdictions, classifying the debts of decedents and specifying the or-surviving wife or children[23] does not otherwise affect the order of preference in which creditors are to be paid; and after such claim has been paid, the claims to which inferior privileges are accorded should be paid in the order established by law.[24]

[§ 1157] (2) Preference among Debts of Same Class—(a) Right of Representative to Give Preference. The representative's right to prefer one creditor over another is generally abolished and all debts of the same class are made payable pro rata in case of deficiency of assets.[25]

[§ 1158] (b) Right of Creditors to Obtain Preference. Under modern American statutes a creditor cannot, by the exercise of superior diligence, obtain any preference over other creditors, but a judgment recovered by him against the personal representative has no higher rank than the claim on which it is founded and gives the claim no preference.[26] Even the fact that a creditor by his diligence has increased the assets by the discovery of a fund applicable to the claims of creditors does not entitle him to any preference over other creditors of the same class; but the newly discovered fund will be distributed among all the creditors according to the local statute.[27] Where an unpreferred creditor has received a dividend on the first annual distribution, and afterward, but within the time limited for the exhibition and allowance of claims, other demands of the same class are allowed, the latter must be paid an equal percentage with the first before the first can share in a second distribution.[28]

[§ 1159] (3) Preferred Claims—(a) In General. In the modern administration of estates there are no priorities among creditors except as given by statute.[29] Where preferred claims are enumerated in the same class the order in which they are enumerated is immaterial, and if the statute does not expressly prefer any one of them over another all are payable pro rata if the assets are insufficient to pay them in full,[30] and if, by the common law, one of the claims enumerated in the statute as preferred was entitled to priority over the others, this priority is not displaced by reason of the fact that the statute mentions this claim after the others which it places in the same class.[31]

[§ 1160] (b) As to General Assets—aa. Funeral Expenses. Both by the common law and the modern statutes the proper expenses of decedent's funeral are given preference, in payment out of the assets, over all debts of the decedent,[32] independent of any promise by the representative to pay.[33]

Such expenses are preferred to debts due the United States[34] or, in England, to the crown,[35] debts of record, such as judgments,[36] claims secured by trust deeds,[37] the expenses of decedent's last illness,[38] and rents in arrear in decedent's lifetime;[39] and under some statutes they have priority over the expenses of administration,[40] while under others funeral and administration expenses stand on a parity.[41]

Advance by representative. Where an administrator has paid for funeral expenses an amount in excess of the personal assets, such amount should be refunded to him out of the proceeds of the realty in preference to all debts not specific liens thereon.[42]

Funeral expenses of decedent's family. In some jurisdictions the statutes giving preference to funeral expenses include expressly or by implication the funeral expenses of decedent's wife and children.[43]

This priority may be lost under some statutes by delay in asserting a claim.[44]

[§ 1161] bb. Expenses of Administration. Both at common law and under modern statutes, the expenses incident to and necessarily incurred in the administration of the estate, or more strictly speaking the claims of the representatives for reimbursement for their payment of such expenses, are entitled to be paid in preference to the debts of the decedent,[45] even though the estate is insufficient taken away except by express statutory provisions.[62] In many states the statutes expressly give a preference to debts due the state or "the public,"[63] but such statutes apply only where the debt of the state and that of the individual are otherwise of equal degree and equally entitled to payment.[64] In the absence of a statute giving a preference to debts due to a county, such debts have no priority over the general debts of decedent,[65] and a debt to a school district has been held not to be entitled to a preference.[66]

[§ 1164] bbb. What Debts Included—(aaa) In General. In determining what debts are within the meaning of a statute giving priority to debts due the state or the public, the wording of the particular statute is of course controlling, and the settled rules of statutory construction must be followed.[67] It may, however, be laid down generally that in order to constitute a debt a public debt, it should, properly, be a debt due the government in its sovereign capacity.[68] The preference given by statute to a claim due the state is not affected by the fact that the state holds a mortgage as security.[69]

[§ 1165] (bbb) Debts to Corporation Owned by State. A debt due to a bank owned and controlled entirely by the state is not a debt due to the state or "the public" within the meaning of a general statute giving such debts a preference.[70] But it is competent for the legislature, by a special enactment, to give debts due to such corporations priority.[71]

[§ 1166] (cc) Taxes and Assessments. The statutes usually include taxes among the preferred debts of decedents,[72] but where the assessment is made after the death of decedent, the taxes are not preferred claims.[73] A statute giving a preference to taxes due the state has been held not to include taxes due to a county,[74] or a claim of a county for taxes collected by decedent, a collector of taxes, and not accounted for;[75] and it has also been held that a preference given to taxes does not include an assessment for a public improvement.[76] Where taxes are not provided for, they will fall under a general classification of "other demands," to be paid after judgments.[77]

[a] Common-law preference denied.—The common law on the point is not in force. The only priority to which the state is entitled is that afforded by the statute. Baxter v. Baxter, 23 S. C. 114; State v. Harris, 18 S. C. L. 598; Klinck v. Keckley, 11 S. C. Eq. 250; Public Account Comrs. v. Greenwood, 1 S. C. Eq. 450.

[b] A judgment belonging to the state has priority over a judgment in favor of an individual. Contee v. Chew, 1 Harr. & J. (Md.) 417.

[c] A specialty debt due to a citizen has been preferred to a simple contract debt due the commonwealth. Com. v. Logan, 1 Bibb (Ky.) 529.

62. Matter of Niederstein, 154 App. Div. 238, 138 NYS 952 (L. [1893] c 686, relating to order of payment of debts of a decedent, and providing that no preference be given one debt over another of the same class, does not abrogate the state's common-law right to a preference as to money held by decedent as an officer and due to it in a sovereign capacity).

63. Baxter v. Baxter, 23 S. C. 114. See the statutes.

[a] Sheriff's bond.—A bond executed to the state treasurer by a sheriff, conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties, is not a "debt due the public," under the act of 1798, so as to give a private person, aggrieved by the act of the sheriff and entitled to sue the bond, a preference over judgment and execution creditors of the sheriff. Dunlap v. Bynum, 4 S. C. Eq. 646.

[b] In Pennsylvania (1) debts due to the commonwealth are payable after all other debts. 1 Brightly's Purdon Dig. p 591. (2) But a judgment in favor of the commonwealth ranks with other judgments. Ramsey's App., 4 Watts 71.

64. Klinck v. Keckley, 11 S. C. Eq. 250; Dunlap v. Bynum, 4 S. C. Eq. 646; Public Accounts v. Greenwood, 1 S. C. Eq. 450.

65. Hargrove v. Lilly, 69 Ga. 326. See also Klinck v. Keckley, 11 S. C. Eq. 250 (where the court expressed doubt as to whether a judgment in favor of the poor commissioners was entitled to a preference as a debt due to the public).

[a] Construction of statutes. — (1) A statute giving priority to debts due the state does not include debts due a county. Hargrove v. Lilly, 69 Ga. 326. (2) But it seems that such debts are included in a statute giving priority to "debts due to the public." Baxter v. Baxter, 23 S. C. 114.

67. Baxter v. Baxter, 23 S. C. 114.

[a] General terms used will not be limited.—Baxter v. Baxter, 23 S. C. 114.

[b] Liability as surety on county treasurer's bond.—The liability of decedent as surety on the bond of a county treasurer who defaulted is a "debt due to the public" within the meaning of a statute preferring such debts. Baxter v. Baxter, 23 S. C. 114.

[c] Taxes collected and retained by decedent.—A statute which gives priority to taxes and levies assessed on a decedent prior to his death gives no lien or priority in favor of the state on the estate of a deceased defaulting sheriff for taxes collected and unaccounted for by him. Spillman v. Payne, 84 Va. 435, 4 SE 749. To like effect Hargrove v. Lilly, 69 Ga. 326.

68. State v. Harris, 18 S. C. L. 598; Klinck v. Keckley, 11 S. C. Eq. 250; Public Account Comrs. v. Greenwood, 1 S. C. Eq. 450; Leake v. Ferguson, 2 Gratt. (43 Va.) 419; Nimmo v. Com., 4 Hen. & M. (14 Va.) 57, 4 AmD 488.

[a] Reason of rule. — "When a government becomes a partner in any trading company, it divests itself, so far as concerns the transactions of that company, of its sovereign character, and takes that of a private citizen. Instead of communicating to the company its privileges and its prerogatives, it descends to a level with those with whom it associates itself, and takes the character which belongs to its associates, and to the business which is to be transacted." [c] What taxes within statute.— Under a statute giving a preference to "taxes assessed upon the estate of the deceased previous to his death" an assessment so far completed before decedent's death that the name of the person described as owner cannot be changed or altered by the assessment officers is payable from his estate as a preferred claim in due course of administration. In re Babcock, 115 N. Y. 450, 22 NE 263 [aff 52 Hun 142, 4 NYS 903].

[d] Parochial and local rates are entitled to a preference in England by virtue of statutory provision. In re Heywood, [1897] 2 Ch. 593.

[e] Assessment on life estate.— Under a statute giving a preference to "taxes assessed on the estate of the deceased previous to his death," where an assessment was made during the decedent's lifetime on realty in which he had a life estate and the taxes remained unpaid at the time of his death, they were entitled to preferential payment out of his personal estate. 77. Dayett v. Willitts, 9 Del. Ch. 424, 74 A 689.

absence of statute the expenses of decedent's last illness have no preference,[78] but in many jurisdictions statutes have been enacted giving a preference to such expenses, including the charges of physicians, bills for medicines, etc.,[79] all claims for such expenses being of equal degree.[80] Such a claim has been held entitled to preference over a judgment,[81] but is subsequent to the expenses of administration,[82] and debts due to the United States.[83] It must, of course, be shown that physician's services, for which a preference is claimed, were actually rendered.[84]

What constitutes last illness. The last illness within the meaning of a statute, giving preference to the expenses thereof, is the illness which terminated in the patient's death and the right to a preference is limited to services performed and expenses incurred during that illness,[85] but unless the period is designated by statute, no paricular period preceding death can be fixed as constituting the last illness, as the duration of such illness must vary considerably according to the nature of the disease and the condition of the patient.[86] Such a statute must, however, be liberally construed,[87] and the expression cannot be limited in meaning to the period during which decedent was in extremis;[88] but on the other hand it relates to the proximate, and not the remote cause of death, and a claim for medical attendance cannot be made to cover a long period during which the patient lingered, partially convalescent, the attendance being broken off during the convalescent period and then renewed on decedent's relapse, especially where there had been a change of physicians.[89]

Services to others than decedent. A statute placing among preferred debts of an estate a debt for "medical services within the twelve months preceding the decease" means services to the decedent only and not to his wife, child, or tenant.[90]

Money borrowed to pay expenses. A demand founded upon a note given by decedent to raise money to pay his doctor's bill cannot be classified as expenses of his last illness.[91]

[§ 1168] ee. Wages of Servants, Etc. Wages due to servants, employees, or laborers for a certain period prior to decedent's death are given a preference under some statutes [92] and such a statute has been held to give a right of preference to the

[b] Mining employees.—The statute providing for the security of claims due employees by mining operators creates by implication a lien in favor of the employees which survives the death of the employer. Everett v. Avery, 19 Md. 136.

[c] Claims of illegitimate children and of their mother.—Where the mother of illegitimate children allowed the father to have their services until they reached majority, in consideration of his agreement to bring them up and to provide a home for her at his death, neither her claim of one to whom wages were due from decedent at the time of his death, although claimant had left decedent's services several months prior to his death.[93]

The term "servant" has been held to include a clerk in a store,[94] a barkeeper in a tavern,[95] and a person hired at a monthly salary, who resided in the house of his employer and whenever required assisted in the domestic labor of the family, although principally employed in aiding the decedent in his market and slaughterhouse,[96] but not to include farm laborers,[97] or persons employed in iron worked.[98]

The term "laborer" has been held not to include an overseer on a plantation unless he also works as a common day laborer.[99]

Inclusion of unpreferred claim. The fact that a servant lent money to her employer and included it in her claim for wages did not affect her statutory right of preference if the sums lent could be easily separated from the sums due for wages.[1]

Waiver of preference. The right of preference given to servants is waived by their acceptance from decedent of an obligation payable at a future day with interest.[2]

In the absence of statute, a claim for wages has no preference.[3]

[§ 1169] ff. Rent.[4] Among the claims preferred by the local statutes rent is frequently included.[5] In order to entitle a claim to preference the relation of landlord and tenant must have existed between the claimant and decedent,[6] although it need not have continued up to the time of decedent's death.[7] A claim for damages for refusal to perform an agreement to lease is not entitled to preference as a claim for rent.[8] Where the lease requires the lessee to pay taxes as part of the rent, such taxes may be allowed as a preferred claim,[9] and a covenant for payment for gas used on the premises has been held to render such payment a part of the rent.[10] So also a claim arising out of the lessee's agreement to repair has been held within the preference.[11] But amounts agreed to be paid for consumption of the property itself are not rent.[12] Where the preference is not exceeding one year's rent, the landlord is entitled to have his claim preferred for one year's rent, although that year is not the last year.[13]

Interest on rent preferred is not allowable as a preferred claim.[14]

[§ 1170] gg. Claims Founded on Fiduciary Relations—(aa) In General. Property which was held in trust by decedent may, if it can be traced, be reclaimed by the cestuis que trust, whose rights are, to this extent, superior to any rights of decedent's creditors.[15] But where the trust funds have been wasted by the trustee or can no longer be traced, the cestui que trust can claim only as a general creditor of the estate,[16] unless some statute claim under the contract nor the claims of the children under an agreement by which they worked for the father after arriving at age and permitted him to hold their wages for them are preferred claims. Story v. Story, 61 SW 279, 62 SW 865, 22 KyL 1731, 1869.

No direct authority is cited or known to us on the question. The legislature in more than one enactment has manifested a purpose to secure to all wage-earners their hire, and to prefer their claims to those of most other creditors. It is conceded that the term 'servant' in its usual acceptation, especially in the law, is broad enough to include a clerk; but it is argued that the word is here used in a restricted sense, and means only menial or household servants. We are loath to recognize any such classification in Kansas as menial servants. The word is broad enough to include a clerk and we think the legislature intended it should do so").

entitles him to a preference.[17] Before the enactment of statutes abolishing the distinction between specialty and simple contract debts in administration,[18] a claim for a breach of trust committed by decedent in his lifetime ranked merely as a simple contract debt,[19] unless the breach of trust was also a breach of a bond or covenant executed by the trustee or fiduciary, in which case the claim ranked as a debt by specialty.[20]

Resulting trust arising from act of representative. It has been held that, where an executor collected money which in equity and good conscience belonged to a third person, and used such money to pay legitimate and preferred debts of the estate, the claim of the owner of such money for reimbursement was entitled to a preference.[21]

[§ 1171] (bb) Statutes Giving Preference—aaa. In General. In a number of states, the statutes give a preference to claims arising out of decedent's misconduct or neglect in fiduciary capacity,[22] whether as executor or administrator,[23] guardian,[24] or trustee.[25] But it has been considered that such a statute includes only a technical trust and not a trust created by implication of law.[26] A statute preferring fiduciary debts is, however, only prospective in its operation, and has no application to the estate of a decedent dying before the passage of the act, although the estate had not been distributed at the time of the passage of the act.[27]

[§ 1172] bbb. Claims against Foreign Fiduciaries. It has been held that a statute giving a preference to claims arising out of a fiduciary relation applies only to the estates of fiduciaries appointed under the laws of that state, the debts of foreign fiduciaries being payable according to their ordinary dignity.[28] But there is also authority for the view that such a statute is applicable to the estate of a foreign executor who had never qualified in the state but died holding assets of his testator there.[29]

[§ 1173] (cc) Subrogation to Preference. It has been held that, where the claim of a person is entitled to preference on the distribution of a decedent's estate as a fiduciary debt, his creditors [29½] or a surety of decedent who is compelled to pay the claim [30] may be subrogated to his right and avail themselves of the preference.

[§ 1174] (dd) Waiver of Preference. The acceptance by the beneficiary of a note from the executor or trustee in payment of his indebtedness arising out of the trust is a waiver of the preference, and no preference can be given a note so taken, in the distribution of his estate.[31] But it is otherwise where a note or bond, although accepted, is not taken in payment of the indebtedness.[32]

[§ 1175] hh. Claims for Provisions Furnished. A preference is sometimes given to claims for provisions furnished to decedent or his family within a specified time prior to his death.[33]

[§ 1176] ii. Liquidated Demands. Under some statutes liquidated demands have preference over debts on open account,[34] a demand being liquidated whenever the amount due was agreed upon by the parties or fixed by operation of law.[35]

decedent's business was continued by his administrator, a creditor whose claim arose after the death of decedent is entitled in equity, upon showing the insolvency of the administrator and that the business into which his goods went was profitable to the estate, to have the profit applied to his debt, or, upon showing that the business was continued with the consent of all parties interested, to have the assets of the estate invested in it first used in payment of his debt.[42]

[§ 1179] kk. Unmatured and Contingent Claims. Between debts of the same class no distinction in dignity or priority exists by reason of the fact that one is due presently and another not due until a future day,[43] but a debt owing presently, although not yet due, retains its priority over debts of lower degree, and without providing for its payment the representative cannot lawfully pay debts of inferior dignity.[44] The existence of merely contingent debts does not, however, in the absence of express statute, prevent the representative from applying the assets to debts of inferior degree.[45]

[§ 1180] ll. Resident and Nonresident Creditors. In the absence of a statute so providing, resident creditors as such have no priority over nonresidents but both stand on a footing of equality according to the ordinary rank and dignity of their claims,[46] notwithstanding the assets in the domestic state are insufficient to pay all the creditors in full and in the state where the foreign creditors reside there are other assets upon which they can administer.[47]

[§ 1181] mm. Time of Filing or Proving Claim. Ordinarily all unpreferred claims exhibited and allowed within the general period limited for that purpose are payable pro rata without regard to the time at which they were presented,[48] but under the statutory system prevailing in some states debts not in the preferred classes have priority according to the time when they are exhibited or filed, those exhibited or filed within a certain period being placed in a class by themselves to be paid in priority to debts exhibited or filed thereafter.[49] The mere filing within the time limited is sufficient to give a claim its statutory rank, and proving or establishing the claim within such time is not necessary, provided that it is finally established within the time allowed for the proof of claims,[50] and it has been

"We cannot think, however, that in any civilized country advantage ought to be taken of the accidental circumstance of property being found within its territory, which may be reduced to possession by the aid of its courts and laws, to sequester the whole for the use of its own subjects or citizens, where it shall be known that all the estate and effects of the deceased are insufficient to pay his just debts. Such a doctrine would be derogatory to the character of any government." Dawes v. Head, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 128, 146.

[a] Reason for rule. — "If the creditors of the domicil may pursue the property of the debtor in his lifetime, in another government, equally with the citizens of the government where the property is situated, no sound reason suggests itself why they should be debarred of a remedy, and the property be appropriated exclusively, or in the first place, to the satisfaction of the creditors in the latter government, on his decease. Even if by permitting them to come in, the property may be insufficient to pay all, and the creditors in the government where the property is situated be thereby compelled to resort to the principal administration, where the debtor had his domicil, or to lose their debts, or a portion of them; this result is no other than might have been attained in the lifetime of the debtor, by his withdrawal of the property from their jurisdiction." Goodall v. Marshall, 11 N. H. 88, 95, 35 AmD 472.

[b] Construction of statute.—The object of the act of 1788, providing that, where an alien died indebted to citizens of that state, the claims of such citizens, although founded on simple contracts, were payable in the same manner as if liquidated by bond or other specialty, was to give citizens of the state a preference over foreigners in the administration of the estate of a deceased alien; but it was not intended that the debts of South Carolina citizens should be paid first to the total exclusion of foreign creditors. [b] Excuse for delay.—A claim, although not filed within the statutory period of eighteen months, may nevertheless be given priority as a claim of the third class, that is, those filed within six months, if "peculiar circumstances entitle the claimant to equitable relief." Brewster v. Kendrick, 17 Iowa 479. See also Kells v. Lewis, 91 Iowa 128, 58 NW 1074 (refusing relief under the circumstances of the case).

[c] Contingent claims.—Where a claim has been filed as a contingent claim, and it appears by the register of claims that the claim has been allowed and established by the court as a claim of the third class, it must be presumed, in the absence of any other evidence, that it was allowed and established only as a contingent claim, and upon such showing alone it is proper for the court to overrule a motion for unconditional payment by the administrator. held that valid claims presented to, and approved by, the representative within the statutory time are entitled to rank accordingly, although not formally filed, if, under the circumstances, other parties in interest are not prejudiced.[51]

[§ 1182] (c) As to Encumbered Property. Property which is subject to a lien or encumbrance can in a strict sense be considered assets of the estate only so far as its value exceeds the amount of the encumbrance,[52] and hence it follows that the rules of priority applicable in the case of general assets of the estate must be subject to considerable modification when applied to encumbered property,[53] although the excess after payment of the encumbrance will be applied according to the usual rules of priority.[54]

[§ 1183] (d) As to Equitable Assets. In the distribution of equitable assets, the courts of equity, applying the maxim that equality is equity, distribute such assets ratably among all creditors irrespective of the dignity of their debts;[55] and where a preferred creditor has received a portion of the legal assets, he is not entitled to share in the equitable assets until the inferior creditors have received from the equitable assets an equal portion of their respective debts.[56] The distinction between legal and equitable assets has, however, been abolished in a number of the states.[57]

[§ 1184] (4) Liens—(a) Judgments and Decrees—aa. Priority as to General Assets—(aa) In General. At common law and under some statutes, judgments rendered against decedent in his lifetime are preferred claims as against the general assets of the estate.[58] Some statutes preferring judgments contemplate that the judgments shall be subsisting liens at the debtor's death or at least be capable of being liens;[59] but in the absence of any such provision a judgment is entitled to preference, although it did not constitute a lien on the debtor's land at the time of his death or would not have constituted such a lien if the debtor had owned any land.[60] As a general rule in order for a judgment to be pre-

[a] A dormant judgment (1) did not rank with other judgments under the statute of 1792, but was classed with "bonds and other obligations;" and its revival after the debtor's death did not alter its rank. Williams v. Price, 21 Ga. 507. (2) A judgment becoming dormant after the decedent's death is not entitled to preference as against a later judgment which had not become dormant, the estate not being shown to be insolvent. Colson v. Kennedy, 88 Ga. 174, 14 SE 119. (3) But judgments which were liens at the debtor's death but became dormant thereafter and which are revived before the assets are distributed operate by relation as of the date of decedent's death, and take rank as preferred claims accordingly. ferred it must have been rendered against decedent in his lifetime,[61] and it is also sometimes required that the judgment shall have been docketed prior to the debtor's death.[62] The judgment or decree must be final,[63] and must not only ascertain that a certain sum of money is due but also order payment;[64] but formal defects in the judgment will not defeat its preferential right.[65] In a number of states the statutes have abolished the common-law priority of judgments over specialty and simple contract debts and made them all payable pro rata out of the general assets,[66] and such a provision does not impair the obligation of contracts, as applied to judgments recovered prior to the passage of the act, decedent dying after such passage.[67]

[§ 1185] (bb) Foreign Judgments. It is generally held that judgments of foreign countries[68] and sister states[69] are not entitled to the priority accorded domestic judgments, but rank merely as simple contract debts.

[§ 1186] bb. Priority as to Property Subject to Lien. Where the personal estate is insufficient, judgments existing in the debtor's lifetime are payable out of the proceeds of the land covered by them in priority to all unsecured debts,[70] but in order that a judgment may have this priority it must have been a lien on the land at the time of the debtor's death,[71] and proceedings thereafter to make it a lien are ineffectual to give it priority.[72]

[§ 1187] cc. Priority Inter Sese.[73] By statute in many states judgments and decrees are payable according to their priority in point of time, the oldest being paid first, the priority, being however, generally determined by the date of docketing or enrollment,[74] and under some statutes the judgment on which execution is first levied has priority.[75] In the absence of any statute governing the matter, judgments and decrees, regardless of their relative priorities in point of time, are payable pro rata on deficiency of assets.[76]

[§ 1188] (b) Specific Liens—aa. Priority as to General Assets. The common-law rule, which has been embodied in statutes in some jurisdictions, is that a mortgage is entitled to no preference out of the general assets merely by reason of the fact that it is a mortgage, but ranks as against the general assets according to the nature of the instrument which it was given to secure.[77] But in a few jurisdictions statutes have been enacted changing this rule, and giving to mortgages and other liens on land a preference in payment out of the general assets.[78]

[§ 1189] bb. Priority as to Encumbered Property. When the personal estate is insufficient, a specific lien binding decedent's land at the time of his death has priority as to the land bound thereby over all unsecured debts of decedent or claims against the estate and in distributing the proceeds of the land among creditors the holder of the lien is entitled to be paid first,[79] and the same rule applies to personalty subject to a specific lien, the lienor having priority over general creditors with respect thereto.[80] The most frequent application of the rule is in the case of land subject to a mort-

of debts in the order in which personal estate is to be applied,[90] or directing a ratable division of the assets among creditors, the encumbered land not being general assets;[91] neither is the operation of the rule affected by a general testamentary charge of debts upon decedent's lands.[92] Statutes changing the common-law classification of debts and placing unsecured debts on a footing of equality do not affect a lien acquired under an execution before the debtor's death,[93] but it has been held that the privilege acquired by the creditor by the seizure of real property of the debtor under a fieri facias must be postponed, in case of the subsequent death of the debtor, to funeral and law charges, and expenses of the debtor's last illness.[94]

[§ 1190] cc. Priority Inter Sese.[95] The statutes sometimes provide that mortgages and other specific liens shall be paid according to their priority in point of time, the oldest being payable first.

[§ 1191] (5) Proceedings for Classification.[96] The classification of claims against a decedent's estate is a matter over which the probate court is often given original jurisdiction by statute.[97] The original jurisdiction thus conferred is held to be exclusive,[98] and the duty of the court to classify claims cannot be dispensed with by consent of the personal representative.[99] A fortiori any classification of debts by the personal representative is subject to revision by the probate court.[1] A creditor with a claim acknowledged by the executor cannot have it classed as privileged without making him a party.[2] The classification of a claim has been considered as a proceeding in rem, requiring a general notice as a jurisdictional fact.[3] Classification of claims is not a merely ministerial or clerical act but may involve the trial of a question of fact,[4] although formal pleadings are not necessary.[5] In passing upon and classifying claims against a decedent's estate the courts exercise equitable powers and regard substance rather than form.[6] A money judgment cannot be rendered in a proceeding to classify a claim.[7] If the statute does not require that the classification of a demand should be entered on the record at large, an indorsement of its class on the claim itself, and an entry on the abstract book, is sufficient to give the classification validity.[8] And it has been held that, since the statute fixes the class to which a claim belongs, a judgment allowing a claim need not specify the class in which the claim is to be placed, but a direction that the claim be paid in the due course of administration is sufficient.[9] While it has been considered that the classification of a claim by the probate court is not such a final judgment as to be conclusive,[10] the more general view is that such classification is a judicial act having the same force and effect as a judgment of any court of general jurisdiction.[11] An appeal from a judgment of classification is generally permitted.[12] It is within the jurisdiction of the court to correct an erroneous classification,[13] even at a subsequent term,[14] on due

[a] The adjudication cannot be set aside in equity on the ground that it was made under a mistake of law, but the party aggrieved is confined to his remedy by appeal or writ of error. Cooper v. Duncan, 20 Mo. A. 355.

[b] Evidence as to status of claim.—Both the county court sitting in probate, and the district court on appeal, may, in classifying claims, hear evidence of a mistake in the terms of a written contract entered into by decedent, in order to determine what the real status of the claim arising out of the contract is, and, having heard such evidence, may grant the appropriate relief. Zieschang v. Helmke, (Tex. Civ. A.) 84 SW 346.

[c] Scope of review.—Where there is only one fund out of which claims can be paid, and it is insufficient to satisfy them, and in the contest in the county court among the respective claimants for priority of payment a judgment is rendered so classifying the claims as to give one nearly the entire fund, to the exclusion of the others, an appeal to the district court by one of the unsuccessful claimants ipso facto brings up the entire case, with its subject matter and all the parties contesting with one another for it. Zieschang v. Helmke, (Tex. Civ. A.) 84 SW 436.

[d] Disposition of cause.—The failure of the district court, on appeal from a judgment of the county court classifying claims, to pass upon the claim of one creditor, although based on the erroneous assumption that such creditor's rights were not before it, is not ground for a reversal of the judgment of the district court, where the action of the county court upon that claim was correct, and the effect was the same as if the district court had properly passed upon it. [a] If an improper classification is the result of a clerical error of the judge, the proper remedy is by motion in the probate court for an order correcting the error nunc pro tunc, and in such a case equity will not interfere by injunction. Jillett v. Union Nat. Bank, 56 Mo. 304.

application and notice,[15] and if fraud or mistake is shown to have affected the original classification the court may reëxamine the claim and place it in its proper class.[16] But as a change in the classification made by the probate court changes the force of the judgment as to all creditors in the prior classes, this should be done only where such facts exist as would authorize the court to modify or set aside its judgments in other respects.[17]

[§ 1192] (6) Loss of Priority. A creditor may by his laches lose his right to priority of payment.[18] But, under a statute classifying claims according to the time of their exhibition to the representative[19] and providing that actions commenced against the representative shall be considered demands legally exhibited from the time of serving the original process, a creditor who has begun an action against the representative does not lose his priority by taking a nonsuit.[20] It has been held that the statutory preference given to the wages of servants does not exist where the servants received from the debtor in his lifetime single bills payable at a future day with interest,[21] but this decision has been disapproved on the ground that the taking of a note bearing interest is not a discharge or waiver of the creditor's lien.[22] A mortgagee may abandon his security and share in the distribution of the general assets,[23] and it has been held that an administrator who claims a privilege on personal property sold to the succession, and who sells the real estate and personal property in bulk, without separate appraisement, loses his privilege.[24]

[§ 1193] 3. Claims of Executor or Administrator—a. Right to Retain Assets in Payment—(1) At Common Law—(a) In General. It is a well settled rule of the common law that if a creditor becomes executor or administrator of his debtor's estate, he may retain so much of the assets in his hands as is sufficient to pay his debt, in preference to all other creditors of equal degree.[25] The reason generally assigned is that the representative cannot commence an action against himself, and if he was not permitted to retain assets for his debt he would be in a worse position than other creditors of the estate,[26] although it has also been considered that a retainer by the representative for his own debt is merely an exercise, in his own favor, of his power to prefer one creditor over another.[27]

"The whole doctrine of retainer is based on the principle of advantage or benefit to the executor or administrator, given him as compensation for the legal disability to sue for his debt." Harrison v. Henderson, 7 Heisk. (Tenn.) 315, 330.

27. Talbot v. Frere, 9 Ch. D. 568, 570 ("The principle is, and always has been, one of preference, not of retainer. . . . An executor had a right to prefer one creditor to another as amongst creditors of equal degree. . . . It followed, therefore, that if he was a creditor he had a right to prefer himself to another creditor of equal degree; and this was called 'retainer' because he had the money in his own hands; but it was, in reality, the exercise of the right of preference in his own favor").

right of retainer may be exercised by an administrator as well as an executor,[28] and extends to a temporary or special administrator,[29] to an administrator de bonis non,[30] to each of several joint executors or administrators,[31] and to the representative of a deceased executor, where such representative represents the estate of the original testator.[32] But the right may be exercised only by the legal personal representative of the estate under administration,[33] and not by an executor named in the will who has renounced probate,[34] or a representative who has resigned,[35] or has been removed.[36]

An executor de son tort[37] cannot retain for his own debt,[38] even against a debt of inferior degree,[39] or although the rightful representative consents to the retainer.[40] But a subsequent grant of administration will validate prior acts and justify a retainer,[41] and if the distributees consent to an irregular administration, the persons so administering may, as against the distributees, retain an amount sufficient to discharge a debt due them by decedent in his lifetime.[42]

An administrator who is an undischarged bankrupt cannot retain a debt due to him from decedent's estate out of the assets received by him as administrator.[43]

[c] Claim for indemnity or reimbursement.—(1) Where an executor is surety for his testator and is compelled to pay the debt, he has a right of retainer in respect to his claim for reimbursement. Milam v. Ragland, 19 Ala. 85; In re Beavan [1913] 2 Ch. 595; Boyd v. Brooks, 34 Beav. 7, 55 Reprint 533 [aff 34 L. J. Ch. 605]; Bathurst v. De la Zouch, Dick. 460, 21 Reprint 348. (2) So also where the executor joined with a third person in a promissory note, on the faith of decedent's promise to indemnify him for any loss, and was compelled to pay the note, he was entitled to retain for such loss. Wildes v. Dudlow, L. R. 19 Eq. 198. (3) It has been held that an executor who is surety for his testator has a right of retainer by way of indemnity, although he has not paid, or been called upon to pay, the debt. Ferguson v. Gibson, L. R. 14 Eq. 379; In re Giles, [1896] 1 Ch. 956; In re Allen, [1896] 2 Ch. 345; Re Orme, 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 51. (4) But the present rule is that before an executor has actually paid a debt of his testator in respect of which he is a surety, there is no debt in existence in respect of which he can exercise his right of retainer. [d] Claim not due.—Although a debt due from the intestate to the administrator may not have fallen due, the administrator may retain funds for the payment of it in preference to debts of an inferior grade. Relph v. Gist, 15 S. C. L. 267.

[e] Claim acquired after decedent's death.—(1) An administrator may retain assets to satisfy a debt due to him on a note of his intestate, indorsed to him after the death of his intestate, but prior to the grant of administration. Reynolds v. Putney, 8 N. C. 318. (2) But an executor has no right to retain for a debt

ing accounts in a court of equity,[45] but he cannot exercise the right of retainer as to his own claim for arbitrary damages, such as damages founded on tort.[46] A personal representative who is one of several joint creditors of decedent is entitled to retain for the whole debt;[47] and the administrator of a deceased partner has been allowed to retain a debt due to him by the firm out of the individual assets of his intestate, even as against an individual creditor of the intestate.[48] If the right to receive payment and the liability to pay are centered in the same personal representative, he has a right to retain for the debt,[49] although it is due to him as the representative of another estate,[50] as trustee for another,[51] even though it is due to another in trust for him.[52] The representative cannot retain for a claim due to other persons,[53] even though such other represents, as trustee, the same interests which the executor or administrator, as such, represents.[54] The right of an executor or administrator to retain from personal assets for a claim which was barred by the statute of limitations during decedent's lifetime has been both asserted[55] and denied.[56] Where the claim did not become barred until after the death of decedent, the representative may retain.[57]

[§ 1196] (d) As against What Claims Right Exists. While the representative is entitled to retain for his debt in preference to all other debts of equal or inferior dignity,[58] he cannot exercise the right so as to obtain a preference over debts of superior dignity.[59] Where a personal representative has claims against the estate both in his individual capacity and as representative of another estate, he cannot retain for the debt due to him in his individual capacity in preference to the claim held by him as representative.[60]

[a] Retainer without notice of claim of higher dignity.—If an executor has fully administered the estate, and has retained a portion of the assets in payment of a debt due himself, without notice of a claim of higher dignity, such claim cannot be enforced against the portion of the assets retained by him. In re Fludyer, [1898] 2 Ch. 562. Contra Cookus v. Peyton, 1 Gratt. (42 Va.) 431.

[b] Retainer must be for debt of highest dignity.—Where a foreign administrator was a creditor of the intestate by specialty and also by simple contract, and received assets insufficient to discharge both debts, he must retain in satisfaction of the specialty debt, and he would be allowed to rank only as a simple contract creditor in respect to the assets in the hands of the domestic administrator. Johnson v. Ward, 2 L. J. Ch. O. S. 137.

[§ 1197] (e) What Assets May Be Retained. An executor or administrator may retain for his own debt out of any legal assets which come into his possession or control,[61] or into the hands of his coexecutor or coadministrator.[62] The doctrine of retainer, however, has no application to equitable assets,[63] and where the representative has retained part of his debt from the legal assets, he will not be allowed to share in the equitable assets until the other creditors have received a proportionate share.[64] While it has been considered that the representative may retain specific chattels, at a fair valuation, for his own claim against the estate,[65] there is also authority for the view that such a course is not permissible, but the representative should convert the assets into money,[66] unless the representative's claim largely exceeds the value of the testator's entire estate.[67] Of course the representative may claim and hold as his own any specific chattel held by decedent, but which belonged to him, and which he could have recovered in detinue from decedent.[68]

Assets in hands of receiver. The executor or administrator has no right of retainer out of assets collected by a receiver appointed in a creditor's suit,[69] although he may retain out of assets which were previously collected by himself.[70]

[§ 1198] (f) Time for Exercise of Right. It has been held that the representative must exercise the right of retainer, if at all, prior to the expiration of the time within which creditors are permitted to sue an executor or administrator.[71]

[§ 1199] (g) Loss of Right. A personal representative may lose his right to retain by acts on his part inconsistent with the existence of the right.[72] But a decree of administration, made in a creditor's suit, does not deprive the personal representative of his right of retainer,[73] although the assets out of which he seeks to retain come into his hands after the decree;[74] nor does the payment into court of money recovered on account of the estate prevent him from exercising his right of retainer.[75]

tor of a debt to himself is always reviewable by the court.[76]

[§ 1201] (2) Under Modern Statutes. In England the right of retainer still exists as at common law,[77] but in the United States and Canada it has been considerably abridged by statutes,[78] some of which preclude its exercise where the estate is insolvent[79] or so as to secure to the representative more than the same pro rata proportion of his claim as other creditors whose claims are of equal rank receive,[80] and some of which preclude the representative from applying any part of the assets to his own claim until such claim has been allowed by the probate court,[81] or even flatly abolish the common-law rule in this respect.[82]

[§ 1202] b. Presumption of Payment from Receipt of Assets. At common law, as a consequence of the right of retainer, if a personal representative receives assets sufficient to pay a claim held by him against decedent, and which he may lawfully retain for that purpose, his retainer for his debt and its consequent extinguishment are conclusively presumed.[83] The mere fact that a creditor becomes the personal representative of his debtor does not, however, raise any presumption of the extinguishment of the debt;[84] but in order to have that effect there must be a receipt of assets by the personal representative sufficient to pay his debt, and which he may lawfully retain for that purpose.[85] No act on the part of the representative in applying the assets in payment of his debt is necessary in order to work an extinguishment thereof;[86] but by operation of law the property in the assets, to an amount sufficient to extinguish his debt, is vested in him, and his debt is paid,[87] and it is not in his discretion to keep alive or continue the debt or by any subsequent act to revive it.[88] This doctrine, being a consequence of the right of retainer, does not apply where the right of retainer has been abolished or materially modified by statute;[89] and under statutes which prevent the personal representative from disposing of tangible personal property except by sale under order of the probate court, the debt of the personal representative is not extinguished unless he receives money,[90] or has possession of other personal assets for a sufficient length of time to

[a] Receipt of depreciated currency.—A personal representative who is a creditor of decedent will not be permitted to receive depreciated currency in payment of debts due the estate, suffer it to become worthless in his hands, and then de-enable him to convert them into money.[91] It has been held that the failure of the representative to apply for an order to sell the real estate of decedent to pay debts for such a length of time as to render him chargeable at the suit of other creditors will raise a presumption of the extinguishment of his own debt.[92] However, an executor who is an alleged creditor of his testator does not, by refraining from exercising his right of retainer, mislead a legatee in any way whereby an estoppel is raised against such creditor in his lifetime or his personal representative after his death.[93]

[§ 1203] c. Secured Claims. A personal representative whose claim against decedent's estate is secured is entitled to the benefit of his security.[94]

[§ 1204] d. Set-Off and Counterclaim. An executor or administrator indebted to the estate of his decedent will not be allowed to pay in full a claim that he holds against that estate, but will be required to offset the debt against his claim.[95]

[§ 1205] 4. Advances to Pay Claims[96]—a. Advances by Executor or Administrator—(1) In General. Although the duty of a personal representative to serve the best interests of the estate does not impose upon him any obligation to advance money or use his own funds for that purpose,[97] it authorizes him to do so; and if, in good faith and for the benefit of the estate, he advances his own funds to pay debts or discharge contracts which are just charges against the estate, he is entitled to reimbursement.[98] And if with good reason the representative pays the just debts from his own means after the personalty is exhausted, he is entitled to repayment from the proceeds of decedent's lands which were originally liable for such debts,[99] although where he seeks to subject the real estate to volve the whole loss on the distributees; but he must retain in payment of his own claim the same kind of money which he receives in payment of debts due the estate. Dickie v. Dickie, 80 Ala. 57.

"It is elementary law that for any money advanced by an executor or administrator of an estate he is entitled to reimbursement out of the estate." In re Gill, 199 N. Y. 155, 160, 92 NE 390.

[a] A statute forbidding the purchase by an administrator of a claim against the estate which he represents is inapplicable to a case where an administrator, for the purpose of protecting the estate against a sacrifice under the foreclosure of a mortgage, advances his own funds and takes an assignment of the mortgage to himself or a third person. Burnett v. Lyford, 93 Cal. 114, 28 P 855.

[b] Payment of claims not presented or allowed.—Where commissioners appointed to receive and adjust all claims against an estate regularly complete and file their report, the administrator is not entitled to an allowance in his account for payments made out of his own funds on claims which were never presented to the commissioners and allowed by them, although the claims so paid were valid against the estate, and would have been properly allowed by the commissioners had they been presented. Bunnel v. Post, 25 Minn. 376.

[c] Necessity for accounting.—An executor who claims for advances to the estate must establish his standing by settling an account. In re Bently, 196 Pa. 497, 46 A 898; Blank's App., 3 Grant (Pa.) 192.

[d] Repayment by successor in the trust.—Where an administrator de bonis non pays to his predecessor a sum of money which the latter advanced to satisfy a just demand against the estate, he is entitled to an allowance in his accounts for the sum so paid. Hearrin v. Savage, 16 Ala. 286.

[e] Advances out of property of third person.—The representative is also entitled to reimbursement for advances made out of property belonging to a third person where he is liable to account therefor to the owner. Birkholm v. Wardell, 42 N. J. Eq. 337, 7 A 569 (administrator allowed reimbursement for advances made from funds held by him as guardian). See also Cordill v. McCullough, 20 La. [b] Right to subject property charged by will with payment of reimburse him for his advances, he must show that the fund or property primarily chargeable with the debts has been faithfully administered and has proved inadequate.[1] The personal representative occupies, however, as to debts paid by him from his own funds, merely the position of the original creditors, and is entitled to no greater preference;[2] and in no case will he be allowed to make a profit for himself from the transaction.[3] Neither may he be reimbursed for payments which were made for his own benefit rather than for the benefit of the estate.[4]

[§ 1206] (2) Retainer of Assets in Satisfaction.[5] At common law, if an executor or administrator makes advances out of his own funds to the value of the personal assets of the estate, he may elect to apply those assets to reimburse himself, and by such election the assets become his own property;[6] but the statutes which in many states prevent the personal representative from disposing of personal property except by sale under order of the probate court[7] have abrogated the right of the personal representative to appropriate specific personal property in satisfaction of his advances.[8]

[§ 1207] (3) Interest on Advances. A charge of interest by a personal representative on advances made by him is not favored, and the circumstances offered to sustain it will be examined with scrupulous care,[9] and interest will not be allowed where funds amply sufficient to meet all claims against the estate were in the possession of the personal representative, or where the failure to obtain sufficient funds was due to his negligence in converting the assets of the estate into money.[10] On the other hand interest will be allowed where the advances were meritorious and beneficial, and the personal representative has been guilty of no neglect or delay in settling the estate.[11] debts.—Where the executors pay a debt, or the creditor accepts their note in place of the note of the testator, so that the executors become the debtors and personally responsible to the creditor, the only effect is that the executors become the creditors of the estate instead of the original creditors, and they may resort to the fund set apart by the will for the payment of debts. Peter v. Beverly, 10 Pet. (U. S.) 532, 9 L. ed. 522 [reaff 1 How. 134, 11 L. ed. 75]. To same effect In re Lefevre, 200 Pa. 531, 50 A 185.

[c] Representative acting in bad faith.—Where an administrator, with knowledge that the personal estate is insolvent, pays debts of the intestate to a larger amount than the personal assets, for the purpose of making the heir his debtor and withdrawing the question of debt or no debt from the proper forum, he is entitled to no relief. Compound interest will not be allowed on advances made by a personal representative.[12]

[§ 1208] (4) Effect of Limitations. The statute of limitations does not begin to run against the claim of an administrator or executor for advances made to pay debts of the estate until he has stated his account.[13] But the payment by the representative out of his own funds of debts against the estate will not prolong the lien of such debts upon the real estate of the decedent, beyond the statutory period, in favor of the representative.[14] It has also been held that if the representative pays a claim which was barred by limitations at the time of payment he cannot be reimbursed from the estate.[15]

An agreement by the heirs that the representative shall receive reimbursement out of the proceeds of the real estate for his advances may prevent the running of the statute of limitations against such advances, so far as the heirs and persons claiming under them are concerned.[16]

[§ 1209] (5) Set-Off of Advances against Debts. On a settlement of the accounts of an executor or administrator, advances made by him for the estate should be set off against amounts found to be due from him to the estate.[17]

[§ 1210] b. Advances by Third Persons. Advances by third persons to the representative for the purpose of paying the debts of an estate ordinarily create only a personal liability on the part of the representative;[18] but, in cases where the representative is entitled to reimbursement from the estate for the debts paid by him, equity will subrogate the person advancing the money to the rights of the representative and allow him to be repaid directly from the estate,[19] but only to the extent that the money advanced has been actually used in the payment of debts for which the estate was legally bound.[20] While payments by third persons directly to creditors of an estate are not favored,[21] reimbursement will generally be allowed where the payments are made in good faith and for the benefit of the estate, especially where they are made by the widow, or an heir or distributee, intending thereby to avoid the expense of administration.[22]

[§ 1211] 5. Interest on Claims—a. When Allowed—(1) In General. Interest is not allowable from a decedent's estate, where from the nature of the claim no interest is due; and the claims of creditors with whom settlement is made in the ordinary course of administration are usually dealt with on the footing they occupied in this respect at the date of decedent's death.[23] Claims bearing interest by

[b] A demand for services rendered decedent in his lifetime, pursuant to his contract to pay therefor, is not an interest-bearing demand, and in an action for the services, brought against decedent's executors, a charge allowing interest from the date of decedent's death is erroneous. their terms should be paid with interest accruing before and after decedent's death, according to their tenor;[24] but interest is not usually allowed on unliquidated claims,[25] although it has been held that such claims bear interest from the time they are due and payable.[26]

[§ 1212] (2) Necessity and Effect of Demand. A demand on the representative within a specified time after his appointment is sometimes made a prerequisite to the recovery of interest accruing after the death of decedent,[27] and such a demand sometimes has the effect of starting the running of interest although the claim was not, theretofore, of an interest-bearing nature.[28] It has been held that a claim based on decedent's failure to comply with his agreement to devise and bequeath certain property to claimant in consideration of claimant's performing services for him, being a claim for liquidated amounts fixed by an express contract to be paid on decedent's death, draws interest from the time claimant filed his pleading to be made a party to an action to settle the estate of decedent, in which he set up his claim.[29]

[§ 1213] (3) Effect of Presentation or Allowance. Interest is sometimes allowed from the time of presentation [30] or allowance [31] of a claim, at the rate prescribed for judgments, although the original demand did not bear interest.[32]

Marthen, 7 KyL 599 (a request by an executor that creditors should postpone collection of their demands to enable him to pay without a sale of the real estate, accompanied by an assurance that their claims should be paid in full, amounted to a waiver of the demand necessary to the allowance of interest where the executor was the only other creditor of the estate, which was insolvent).

[d] Partial payment before demand.—(1) A personal representative by merely making a payment upon a claim before it is verified does not waive his right to require, as a condition precedent to a recovery of interest accruing after the debtor's death, that the claim be verified and the payment of the balance due thereon be demanded within a year from the time of his qualification. Contracts of representative generally see supra § 483.

Period of Computation. Where claims are paid in the ordinary course of administration, interest is computed up to the time of payment.[34] It has been held that on a sale of land under order of court for the payment of debts, interest on the debts payable out of the proceeds of the sale should be computed only up to the day of sale[35] or confirmation of the sale,[36] although creditors are entitled to their proportionate shares of the interest earned by the fund arising from the sale;[37] but it has also been considered that the rule of computing interest up to the date of payment applies in such case.[38] Where an executrix recovered judgment on a vendor's lien note and bought in the land on execution sale, and the debt evidenced by the note in fact belonged to a person other than testator, but the true creditor had had it made out to testator to secure a debt, it was held that the executrix, in accounting to the true debtor for the money due him, should pay interest from the date when she purchased the land.[39] On a decree against a decedent's estate to recover property, or the avails thereof, fraudulently obtained from her husband under continued concealment of a former and existing marriage, an award of interest from the date of her death was sufficiently favorable to the estate.[40]

Judgment against the representative. A statute providing that the amount of interest to be paid on a judgment against an executor or administrator shall be determined by the orphans' court, changes, so far as personal representatives are concerned, the ordinary rule that judgments carry interest from their rendition.[41]

[§ 1216] (2) Rate. Interest on claims against estates under administration is usually allowed at the contract rate,[42] or, in the absence of contract, at the legal rate.[43] In some jurisdictions, however, statutes prescribe a different rule as to insolvent estates,[44] or limit the interest allowable against decedent's estate to a smaller rate than would be permitted against living persons.[45]

Directions in the will for the payment of interest on a debt of the testator at a rate in excess of the legal rate entitle the creditor to interest at that rate as against the legatees.[46]

[§ 1217] (3) Compound Interest. Compound interest is not generally allowed in the absence of a special agreement to pay the same.[47]

[§ 1218] c. Preference of Interest on Preferred Claims. It has been held that the interest accruing on a preferred claim, being a mere incident of the claim, is also preferred,[48] but there is also

[b] When allowed.—A resident of New York devised to his children land situated in a foreign country. The part of the land encumbered by a mortgage was insufficient to pay the mortgage debt. The entire land was sold by the executrix, the widow, and the creditor was paid, and a balance was received by the executrix and by her executor and used in the business of testator conducted by the executrix and her executor, as desired by testator and the executrix. The sale by the executrix was made in good faith to protect the interests of the children. She had used her own money in the business which had become profitable. It was held that a judgment in favor of the children against the estate of the executrix for the amount of the balance, with simple interest on the amount received by the executrix, and with compound interest with annual rests on the amount received by her executor, was a proper disposition of the rights of the parties. Farrell v. Farrell, 142 App. Div. 605, 127 NYS 764 [rev on other grounds 205 N. Y. 450, 98 NE 857].

authority for the view that a statutory preference extends to the claim only, and the interest thereon is not preferred but must share ratably with unpreferred claims.[49]

[§ 1219] 6. Time of Payment. It is the duty of a personal representative to pay off claims against an estate as speedily as possible, consistent with the rights and interests of all the parties interested;[50] and he should not retain amounts that he has collected for the estate and allow interest to accumulate on claims.[51] Payment may, however, properly be suspended pending litigation over a claim of the estate against the creditor.[52] As a general rule a claim against the estate is not payable by his personal representative until after the expiration of the period allowed creditors for presenting their claims has expired,[53] and until such claim has been established by a court of competent jurisdiction or its payment duly authorized by the probate court.[54] And it has been held that the probate court has no power to order the payment of a debt from the estate until the settlement of the administrator's account.[55] It is sometimes provided by statute that the estate must be settled and claims paid before the expiration of a certain time.[56] Under the general authority conferred upon a personal representative to preserve the estate, he has the power to make a valid contract with a creditor extending the time of payment of a claim owing by the estate, provided that the claim is not already barred by the statute of nonclaim and that the contract is for the benefit of the estate.[57] If the payment of debts is unreasonably delayed while the estate is solvent, and afterward it becomes insolvent, the personal representative is liable to the creditors.[58]

Testamentary provisions postponing the time of settlement and distribution cannot postpone the right of creditors to compel payment of their demands.[59]

[§ 1220] 7. Mode and Sufficiency of Payment —a. In General. What facts are sufficient to constitute the payment of a claim depends upon the circumstances of the particular case,[60] taking into consideration the intent of the parties,[61] as well as the other elements necessary to constitute a valid payment generally.[62] An award by the probate court to a creditor of the amount of his claim out of funds adjudged to be in the hands of a personal representative is not the equivalent in law of the actual payment of the claim,[63] and if such creditor, by reason of the personal representative's insolvency, fails to receive payment of the sum awarded to him, he is entitled to come in and share in a subsequently raised fund of the estate.[64]

[§ 1221] b. Medium of Payment. The court may require a personal representative to pay a debt in the kind of money which he has received as property of the estate.[65] Although a personal represen-to pay both specialty and simple contract debts, the specialty creditors were entitled to interest up to the time of the apportionment of the assets).

[a] Rule applied. — It appeared that a trust company issued a certificate of deposit payable one year after date, bearing interest, in which it was recited that the depositor had deposited a stated sum of money, and that "the above deposit is not subject to check, and is transferable only on the books of the company on the return of this certificate." The depositor owed his wife the exact sum stated in the certificate, being the proceeds of land which he had sold for her. After the depositor's death, his widow, who was one of his executors, presented the certificate on the day it became due, and received a new certificate in which it was recited that she, one of the executors of decedent, had deposited the same sum of money as the amount of the old certificate, payable one year afterward to herself on return of the certificate. She indorsed the certificate in her own name as one of the executors. In each of the five succeeding years she returned the certificate delivered to her in the preceding year, and received a new one in the same form. On the certificates after the first one she simply indorsed them with her own name, excepting in one instance. A witness testified that at the time the old certificate was surrendered the widow directed the officer of the trust company "to fix it in her name," and gave to him as a reason "so that she could get it." This witness was an executor of the widow, and did not include the last certificate in the inventory of her estate. It was held that the facts shown were sufficient to sustain a finding that the widow had appropriated all of the assets to satisfy the debt due to her. Fett's Est., 39 Pa. Super. 246.

65. Magraw v. McGlynn, 26 Cal. 420. See also In re Dem, 39 Cal. 70 (where executors selling property of the estate for the payment of debts made the sale for and received paytative's settlement in depreciated currency is set aside as null and void, yet such creditors as received depreciated currency willingly in discharge of their debts will not be allowed to revive their claims against the estate, and, the estate being insolvent, the pro rata dividends to which such creditors would, if paid in legal currency, be entitled are to be allowed to the personal representative as credits.[66] Where a personal representative, out of depreciated currency collected by him in the course of his administration, pays specie debts of his decedent, in the settlement of his account he should be credited with the debts so paid at their nominal amount;[67] but when he advances his own depreciated currency in payment of debts he must account to the estate for the difference between the nominal and real value of such currency.[68] It is no objection that certain payments and allowances were not met and discharged as they accrued, in depreciated money, but were allowed against the estate on a basis of money current at the time of the settlement, when it is shown that the estate benefited thereby.[69] The rule of law that a creditor is paid his debt when he becomes executor of his debtor's estate and as such receives assets applicable to such debt does not apply when the assets so received are depreciated currency,[70] unless the creditor is willing to receive it in payment.[71]

[§ 1222] c. Giving of Note by Personal Representative. A promissory note given by a personal representative for a debt of his decedent is neither a payment nor an extinguishment of such debt,[72] unless it is shown that the parties intended that it should operate as such.[73]

[§ 1223] d. Assignment of Note Due Decedent. A personal representative has authority to assign bills and notes due to decedent in satisfaction of debts due by him,[74] but he has no power by assignment or otherwise to appropriate them to the payment of the debt of one creditor to the exclusion of others of equal or higher rank.[75] If a creditor accepts notes and obligations in favor of an estate as collateral security to collect and apply to his debt and fails to collect or to show good reason for his failure, he will be charged with the amount of such notes and obligations, and if this amount is equal to his claim against the estate such claim is extinguished.[76]

[§ 1224] e. Transfer of Assets—(1) In General. An agreement under which a creditor who has purchased certain of decedent's property pays for it by giving credit upon an account which he claims against the estate has been held binding upon both the representative and the creditor,[77] and it has been held that creditors, who have obtained the possession of any property through the transfer thereof in their favor by the administrator of the estate, must be considered as the legitimate owners of the property ceded or transferred, so long as the cession or transfer of the same is not annulled by an express judicial declaration made in a proper action brought on the ground of some vice or defect tending to nullify the same.[78] So also where executors were given full power to manage the estate "as fully and completely as if they were owners absolutely and in fee simple" and to do "all and everything else which in their opinion may be proper to do for the benefit of said estate," and an agreement was entered into between the executors, legatees, and creditors, by which certain property was to be turned over to a creditor, and this agreement was held valid and the executors borrowed money under it to pay other creditors, and it appeared that all other outstanding debts had been paid and that the agreement was beneficial to the estate, the creditor who received the property could not object that no merchantable title could be given to him until a final settlement and that the executors had no power under the will to enter into the agreement.[79] But it has also been held that a power to sell does not include a power to give in payment,[80] and that, until the rendition of an account and the classification of the debts of the estate, the personal representative cannot, even under an order of the court, transfer an asset of the estate to a creditor in payment of his debt.[81]

[§ 1225] (2) Rights of Creditors When Assets Improperly Transferred. Creditors may follow and recover assets of the estate which have been improperly transferred by the personal representative,[82] where they are acquired from him by persons with knowledge of his trust and of his disregard of its obligation.[83]

[§ 1226] f. Set-Off.[84] Any debt or demand which constitutes a legal set-off for or against a party in his lifetime, if still subsisting at the time of his death, will constitute a good set-off for or against his personal representative;[85] and a personal representative should not pay a debt due by the estate which he represents to a person who is himself indebted to the estate, without first having set off the debt due to the estate against that due

by the estate,[86] although his failure to insist on the set-off does not bar the right of the estate with respect to the claim which should have been set off.[87] In determining what are proper set-offs between personal representatives and claimants against the estate, the rule requiring mutuality of debts or demands has been applied;[88] but it has also been held that a personal representative may accept claims against the estate in discharge of claims accruing after decedent's death, and is entitled to set off the one against the other,[89] and that an administrator who has sold property of decedent to a creditor of the estate may set off the price against the pro rata dividend of such creditor upon the distribution of the funds of the estate.[90]

A legacy to a creditor cannot be set off against his claim where it does not appear that the legacy was given in satisfaction of the debt.[91]

[§ 1227] g. Compromise.[92] As a general rule a personal representative may effect the settlement of claims against the estate by compromising them, and should be allowed any sums paid out by him in so doing if he has acted in good faith and with the care and judgment of a man of ordinary prudence and sagacity.[93] But a compromise by the personal representative of a claim due by the estate will not be enforced in equity unless it is shown to be to the interest of the estate and a proper one for such representative to make.[94] Under some statutes authority from the court is necessary to authorize the representative to make a compromise,[95] or the court is given authority to authorize such action on the part of the representative.[96]

[§ 1228] 8. Application of Payments.[97] The doctrine that, where a debtor makes a payment, he may, if he chooses, direct its application, that if he does not direct, the creditor may elect as to the application, and that if a payment has been made and neither party has elected as to the application, the court will direct the application to those debts which have the poorest security, applies when a payment is made by a personal representative to a creditor of his decedent.[98] Payments made by the executor of an insolvent estate go in reduction of the principal and interest then due, and where such payments exceed the interest due at their date, the excess must be applied on the principal.[99] Where a payment is objected to because one of the items is outlawed, but it appears that other items of the claim exceed the payment for which claimant receipted in full, the entire payment may be applied on the items justly due.[1]

[§ 1229] 9. Payment before Allowance or Order.[2] Ordinarily, the personal representative is not authorized to pay a claim against the estate until it has been allowed,[3] and under some statutes he should

[§ 1230] 10. Improper Payments[7]—a. In General. A personal representative will not as a general rule be allowed credit for the payment of a claim which is not a proper charge upon the estate, and if he pays such a claim out of assets of the estate he commits a devastavit.[8] But this rule is not applied with such strictness as to deny credit tor after paying debts.—One appointed administrator after taking charge of an estate and paying debts of decedent is not entitled over the objection of the heirs to credit in the final settlement for the debts paid. Dockery v. Sparks, 170 Mo. A. 651, 157 SW 365.

Houghteling v. Stockbridge, 136 Mich. 544, 99 NW 759. (2) So also under a statute providing that, whenever any will shall empower executors as to the payment of debts, the directions of the will shall be followed, and under the general principles applicable to express trusts, the statute of limitations is no bar to the payment of unprobated claims in carrying out a will creating an express trust for the payment of debts. for payments made in good faith on claims which the representative, without negligence, supposed to be proper, even though it is subsequently ascertained that payment might have been successfully resisted, or the claim reduced in amount.[9] If a personal representative pays funds of the estate to persons who are not entitled to receive them he will not be protected.[10] Where a paper purporting to be a consent decree in a case in which an administrator was a party was inoperative because the court was without jurisdiction to render it, but operative as an agreement to which the administrator had assented, the heirs of the estate were not concluded by the paper, as an agreement, from calling the administrator to an accounting for any matter therein which charged the estate with claims for which it was not chargeable, or which provided for a distribution of the assets of the estate in any manner other than provided by law.[11]

A testamentary direction as to the amounts to be paid to certain creditors does not render payments in excess of such amounts improper where it appears that the amounts actually paid were justly due.[12]

Persons who receive money from an administrator in payment of supposed claims against the estate can be held guilty of a tort in receiving the money only in case of an actual fraudulent intent to appropriate moneys of the estate to a purpose which they know, or as reasonable men ought to know, is unlawful.[13]

Com., 4 Hen. & M. (14 Va.) 57, 4 AmD 488; Mayo v. Bentley, pays claims of an inferior degree and there are not funds remaining sufficient to pay such superior claims he commits a devastavit [15] and is personally liable to the preferred creditor for the deficiency,[16] even though the payment was made through an honest mistake.[17] But no devastavit is committed when the right to priority accrued after the payment complained of.[18]

If the representative had no notice, actual or constructive, of the claims entitled to preference he incurs no personal liability by reason of paying debts of inferior dignity,[19] unless the representative voluntarily avoided the means of knowledge,[20] or the payment was so precipitate that the preferred creditor did not have the opportunity to which he was entitled to make his claim known.[21]

Contingent or unmatured claims. If the claim of higher degree is merely contingent, the common-law rule is that even if the representative has notice of such a claim he may exhaust the assets in paying debts of inferior degree without incurring any liability to the holder of the contingent claim, although the claim subsequently becomes due by the happening of the contingency,[22] but it is otherwise where the claim of higher degree is not contingent but merely payable at a future day.[23]

If the representative reserves assets to pay the superior claims, the payment of debts of inferior dignity is not a devastavit,[24] although the assets reserved are lost, if no blame for such loss can be imputed to the personal representative.[25]

[§ 1232] (2) Preferring One Creditor of Class.[26] Under the modern statutes in the United States and Canada if the personal representative pays one debt of a class to the exclusion of others of the same class he commits a devastavit or renders himself personally liable for the deficiency, if any, resulting therefrom,[27] although he is entitled to credit to the extent of such creditor's pro rata share.[28]

[a] The representative can have credit only for the share to which the overpaid creditor was entitled,

[§ 1233] c. Payment Out of Funds Not Belonging to Estate.[29] Funds which have been trust funds in the hands of a decedent remain the property of the cestui que trust and cannot be held liable for decedent's debts,[30] and where an executor wrongfully makes payment of debts of the estate out of trust funds not primarily liable therefor, the beneficiary can be reimbursed to the extent of such misappropriation out of the property primarily liable, if it or its proceeds still exist.[31] If money is collected by a personal representative and improperly appropriated to the payment of the debts of his decedent under a mistaken belief as to his right to do so, and without collusion with the heirs, he becomes individually liable therefor, and land descending to the heirs cannot be subjected to its repayment.[32] Where a personal representative under a misconception that certain moneys coming to his hands are assets of the estate pays a portion of the creditors of a certain class a dividend on the amount of their claims, and it afterward turns out that such moneys are not assets, and there is nothing left to pay any of the claims of this class, a court of equity will not require the personal representative to pay the same pro rata share on the claims of other creditors of this class.[33]

[§ 1234] d. Payment under Authority of Court. A personal representative will be protected in the payment of a claim which has been duly allowed or ordered paid by the court, although such claim was not a proper one for payment,[34] or although it should not have been paid in full,[35] unless it is made to appear that such allowance of the claim or order for the payment thereof was obtained through his collusion or bad faith,[36] or that the court was without authority to make the order relied on for protection.[37]

[§ 1235] e. Recovery Back of Payment Made through Mistake or Improperly. Where an administrator pays a claim regularly filed, in ignorance of the fact that it has been already paid by a sale under execution levied on property of a codebtor of the intestate, and on the final settlement of the estate is allowed a credit for such payment, an administrator de bonis non may recover back the money so paid from the party to whom it was paid, in an action for money had and received.[38] Administrators have been held entitled to recover from a surrogate the amount paid him as an attorney's fee for representing them, with which their accounts had been surcharged.[39]

[§ 1236] 11. Liability for Failure to Pay Claims —a. In General. A personal representative's failure to pay a claim, which it is his duty to pay, may render him personally liable therefor,[40] and it has been held that, where an administrator's statutory liability for claims has once attached, the creditor's right becomes absolute against him and his estate, Hunt v. Russ, 18 D. C. 527.

[b] An ex parte petition of an administrator, erroneously stating that a lien exists on certain assets, and asking permission to apply the assets to the satisfaction of the alleged lien, is not a proceeding to test the validity of a claim of lien within the meaning of the statute, which provides that the person claiming to have a lien on any property of a decedent may be made a party to a proceeding by the administrator to test the validity of such claim to a lien, and an order of the chancellor entered on such petition directing the payment of the claim does not protect the administrator in making such payment. "It is a wholesome lesson to teach Executors, that if having assets of the estate out of which debts can be paid, they neglect to make such payment and allow the lands to be sold, they may be made liable for any loss occasioned thereby." McPhadden v. Bacon, supra.

[a] Illustration.—Where an executor, knowing of the existence of a claim against his decedent on account of his being a stockholder in a national bank, distributes his entire estate, he is, ultimately, personally liable to the receiver for such national bank. Mortimer v. Potter, 213 Ill. 178, 72 NE 817 [aff 114 Ill. A. 422].

[b] An administrator is personally liable for the expenses of decedent's funeral where he has in his hands assets sufficient to pay the same. Benedict v. Ferguson, 15 App. Div. 96, 44 NYS 307.

[c] Where a personal representative is indebted to the estate, and instead of applying the amount of the debt to the payment of claims permits the land to be sold to satisfy creditors, he commits a devastavit and is liable to the heirs and devisees for the full amount of the injury they sustain by the sale. Farys v. Farys, 5 S. C. Eq. 261. See also McPhadden v. Bacon, 13 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 591 (indebtedness of co-executor).

[d] Failure to subject realty to payment of debts.—An administrator is guilty of waste where he fails to cause the real estate of his decedent to be applied to the payment of his debts, when the personal property is insufficient. New Hampshire Strafford Bank v. Mellen, Smith (N. H.) 385.

[e] Liability for tax.—The individual property of a personal representative may be taken for a tax imposed on him in his representative capacity, when no property of the estate can be found. In re McMahon, 66 HowPr (N. Y.) 190.

[f] When liability accrues.—Personal representatives are not personally liable to the creditors for their claims until after a decree has been made by the probate court for the distribution of the assets among the creditors, and the expiration of the time limited for payment. Orange County Bank v. Kidder, 20 Vt. 519.

Failure or refusal to pay claims whether the claim could, or could not, have been enforced against decedent's estate.[41] The representative's liability is, however, limited to the amount of assets which would have been applicable to the payment of debts and would have been so applied if the representative had properly and faithfully performed his duties.[42]

[§ 1237] b. Interest or Costs. A personal representative having assets of the estate in his hands is chargeable individually with interest[43] or costs[44] accruing because of his failure to pay at the proper time claims against the estate which it was his duty to pay.

[§ 1238] c. Penalty for Failure to Pay. A personal representative who fails to pay a claim when so ordered is, by statute in some jurisdictions, subject to a penalty.[45]

[§ 1239] 12. Proceedings to Enforce Payment —a. Proceedings in Probate Court—(1) Jurisdiction. Probate courts generally have jurisdiction to order the payment of the duly allowed or established claims of creditors;[46] but the issues involved may be such as to bring the case within the exclusive jurisdiction of a court of equity.[47]

[§ 1240] (2) Nature and Form of Proceedings. A claim against a decedent cannot be enforced in a summary proceeding by rule to show cause,[48] unless such a proceeding is authorized by statute.[49] But special proceedings for enforcing the payment of claims are sometimes provided by statute.[50] It has been held that, where a claimant neglects to take advantage of the means provided by statute for satisfying his claim, he has no remedy at law or in equity.[51] Although a judgment of allowance of a claim is not a complete and effective judgment until an order on the representative to pay is obtained, a proceeding to obtain such an order is not an action on the judgment of allowance.[52]

52. Gutierrez v. Scholle, 12 N. M. 328, 78 P 50 ("This proceeding is in no sense an action on the judgments of allowance. It was an application simply to the probate court to direct the administrator to distribute the funds in his hands as such to defendant as a creditor of the estate, as is authorized by Laws 1901, p. 155,

[§ 1241] (3) Conditions Precedent. Where a debt was established by a judgment against one in his lifetime, it is not necessary to establish the debt after his death by a new adjudication on the judgment before taking proceedings to enforce payment.[53]

[§ 1242] (4) Set-Off. In proceedings to compel an administrator to pay an allowed claim against the estate, the court of probate has jurisdiction to allow and enforce a set-off.[54]

[§ 1243] (5) Who May Proceed for Payment. A creditor, within the meaning of a statute allowing a petition for the payment of a claim to be presented by a creditor, is a person to whom decedent was indebted during his lifetime[55] or an assignee of such person.[56] On an application by the assignee of a claim against an estate for the payment thereof, a contention that the assignment was to secure another person, and that the applicant is not the real party in interest, is of no avail to the estate.[57] One claiming against an estate for breach of a contract made by decedent cannot, until he becomes a judgment creditor, interfere with property in the hands of the executor.[58]

[§ 1244] (6) Notice. Unless required by statute no notice is necessary to authorize a probate court to decree payment of debts and distribution of assets among creditors.[59]

[§ 1245] (7) Issues and Proof. Where on motion to pay a demand against a decedent's estate, previously allowed and assigned to a designated class, the administrator tenders only the issue of payment, the validity of the judgment allowing and classifying the demand is not in issue, either in the probate court or on appeal.[60] Insufficiency of assets being a matter of defense, the petitioner cannot be defeated because of a failure to prove that the assets are sufficient to pay all claims in full.[61]

[§ 1246] (8) Hearing and Determination. Where in an action to compel an administrator to account and to pay a judgment against his intestate, limitations were pleaded, the court should first determine that issue, and should not order an account and settlement unless it found against the plea.[62] Where the claim is founded on a tort of decedent, and the representative has failed to disallow it and liability has thus become fixed, the case is properly remitted for new trial to determine whether the amount claimed is reasonable.[63] The proceeding is properly dismissed without prejudice where there is pending an accounting in which all the rights of the parties may be determined.[64]

[§ 1247] (9) Judgment, Decree, or Order—(a) In General. A decree for the payment of a claim should determine the amount to be paid,[65] the person to whom it is payable,[66] and all other questions concerning the claim.[67] Where, in proceeding in a surrogate's court to determine and enforce the lien of attorneys for services in the settlement of an estate, no services were shown to have been rendered for the executor, as legatee under the will, or for him individually, as apart from the services the amount of which were proper expenditures from the estate, the surrogate's court, ordering that the amount found due the attorneys was a lien on the assets could not order that they have execution against the executor individually, that being in effect a judgment against the executor individually.[68]

[§ 1248] (b) Time for Making. The court has as much power to make an order for a dividend on a day subsequent to that on which an order settling the account of an administrator is passed as it has on the day the account is settled,[69] but it cannot order the personal representatives of decedent to make any payments before there has been any statement of account.[70]

[§ 1249] (c) Entry. Where an order for a dividend is made on the same day that an order is made settling the account of an administrator, the order for a dividend is properly included in the same entry in the minutes with the order settling the account, and immediately following.[71]

[§ 1250] (d) Effect. A final decree directing executors to pay a certain sum to themselves as trustees is conclusive as to assets in proceedings for contempt;[72] but if a representative's account on a settlement before the county court shows that he has no cash, but only property in his hands, and the court makes an order that all demands of a particular class be paid, it is upon the implied condition that funds sufficient for that purpose first come into his hands; and a creditor of that class who sues out a scire facias to compel payment of his demand must show that the property has been converted into cash.[73]

[§ 1251] (e) Enforcement. Where imprisonment for debt has been abolished, a final decree against a personal representative for the payment of a debt due from his decedent cannot be enforced by attachment and sequestration.[74] The remedy where there are no funds in the hands of the repre-

c. 81, § 26. This order was necessary to render the former judgments of allowance effective. Until the order to distribute was made in this case, there was no obligation to pay on the part of the administrator. There was no complete and effective judgment until that time. This was true, even before the act of 1901, supra. While no procedure of this kind was heretofore specifically provided by statute, the administrator has always been required to account to the probate court, and we know of no provision of law requiring him to pay creditors until so directed by the probate court. It follows that neither was there a complete judgment against which the statute of limitations would begin to run until, at least, the order to pay was obtained").

sentative belonging to the estate of decedent which can be reached is by execution against the individual property of the personal representative, if he has wasted the estate which came into his hands.[75]

[§ 1252] (f) Setting Aside. Where a personal representative with full knowledge of the facts has neglected to prosecute an appeal directly from an order for the payment of claims, as authorized by the statute, he cannot be relieved from the order on an application for its vacation.[76]

[§ 1253] (10) Review. Orders directing the payment of claims against the estate of decedents are generally appealable,[77] and an order of the probate court dismissing a petition to have the personal representative show cause why a claim that has been allowed shall not be paid has also been held to be appealable.[78]

[§ 1254] b. Proceedings in Equity—(1) In General. A court of equity will not enforce a claim against a fund alleged to be held by the executrix in trust for the payment of debts until the claim is established against the estate.[79]

[§ 1255] (2) Creditors' Suits.[80] The creditor of a deceased debtor, like any other creditor, may resort to equity for the purpose of reaching assets for the payment of his claim.[81] The general rule that a creditor must obtain a judgment on his claim before he can maintain a creditor's suit[82] has been held applicable to a creditor of the estate of a decedent,[83] but it has also been held that the creditor is not obliged to obtain a judgment at law before he can avail himself of his remedy.[84]

[§ 1256] c. Execution. It has been held that, where a judgment has been obtained against a personal representative, who without paying the judgment proceeds to distribute all decedent's property among his legal distributees, the judgment creditor may levy his execution on any of the property distributed;[85] that when a claim is filed and allowed against an estate it becomes a judgment, and the creditor may have execution thereon, but the execution must follow the judgment and two separate and distinct claims should not be included in one execution;[86] that where in the prosecution of a claim a lien has been acquired by attachment against a defendant who dies pending the suit, plaintiff may, on obtaining judgment against the personal representative have execution against the property so attached, whether or not commissioners have been appointed to hear claims against the estate;[87] and that a judgment creditor is not entitled to an execution against the funds of an estate without first obtaining permission from the surrogate for execution to issue,[88] but a surrogate's order permitting a judgment creditor to issue an execution against the representative is, except on appeal therefrom, conclusive evidence of assets applicable to the judgment.[89] A constitutional provision conferring upon probate courts exclusive jurisdiction over decedents' estates, has been held to abrogate a statute authorizing the issuance of execution for the enforcement of judgments against executors and administrators as such, which necessitated that such a judgment should be revived against a successor before execution could issue against him, and vested in the court exclusive power to enforce claims against estates.[90]

tors and administrators are very generally required by statute to reserve a portion of the assets for the payment of claims which are contingent, or as to which suits are pending, or which are not yet due.[92] So also a court of equity has power, in cases where there is a clear debt to be paid or duty to be performed at a future day, to order that sufficient assets for the discharge of it be retained and secured by the personal representative, before the distribution of the estate,[93] and a surrogate has power to direct an administrator, on his accounting, to retain the amount of a disputed claim, where the claimant failed to sue because of the nonresidence of the administrator, and his refusal to make a voluntary appearance.[94] But on entering a final decree on an administrator's accounting, the surrogate will not direct him to retain the amount of a disputed claim, which claimant has made no effort to enforce.[95] Where a claim was presented to an administrator for payment by a minor claimant within twelve months after she arrived at age, as authorized by statute, it was no defense to the administrator's liability that, although he had received sufficient assets to pay the claim, he had distributed the same in good faith without notice of the claim.[96]

[§ 1258] 14. Liability of Creditor to Refund. At common law a creditor who had received his just debt in good faith from a personal representative could not be compelled to refund any part of it,[97] even though preferred debts of the estate remained unpaid;[98] but according to the rule which now generally obtains, when a personal representative under an honest belief that the estate is solvent pays a creditor in excess of his pro rata distributive share, he may upon its being ascertained that the estate is really insolvent recover the overpayment from the creditor.[99] There can be no such recov-

"At common law, a creditor who had received more than a pro rata share of an intestate's estate could not be compelled to refund any part of it. . . . This ancient rule has been held applicable, in some instances in this country. Reason and the weight of authority support the principle that whenever such a creditor obtains from a personal representative of a decedent's estate, under a mistake of fact, a sum of money on account of his demand, which, ex aequo et bono, he ought not to retain, it may be secured in an action instituted for that purpose. . . . Recoveries are had in such cases by administrators in actions at law without invoking the doctrine of following trust funds, a relief which is available only to a cestui que trust in a court of chancery when the property can be identified." Thorson v. Hooper, supra.

[a] Form of action.—(1) The personal representative may recover the overpayment in an action for money had and received for the use of the estate (Wolf v. Beaird, 123 Ill. 585, 15 NE 161, 5 AmSR 565 [rev 23 Ill. A. 486 (foll Beaird v. Wolf, 19 Ill. A. 36; Foskett v. Wolf, 19 Ill. A. 33)]), and (2) after his final settlement, for his own use (Wolf v. Beaird, 123 Ill. 585, 15 NE 161, 5 AmSR 565 [rev 23 Ill. A. 486]; Rogers v. Weaver, 5 Oh. 536, Wright 174).

[b] When proof of insolvency at time of payment unnecessary.—It is not necessary to aver or prove, in

ery, however, where the creditor receiving payment has been prejudiced by the representative's failure to comply with the law, bad faith, or negligence,[1] where there were sufficient funds on hand, at the time when a claim was paid, to pay all other claims of equal or superior dignity, and the estate subsequently became insufficient through the fault of the representative,[2] where the representative pays a claim with full knowledge of all surrounding conditions, including the insolvency of the estate,[3] or where the payment was made on the personal authority of the representative rather than as a debt of the estate,[4] as in the case of payments to the representative's attorney[5] or payments made in the course of an unauthorized continuance of decedent's business.[6] Neither can the overpaid creditor be compelled to refund at the suit of other creditors, as the remedy of the latter is upon the bond of the representative.[7] Where a claim to beneficial ownership of a deposit in decedent's name was made in good faith, and the administratrix transferred funds to claimant in satisfaction thereof, there was no devastavit by claimant.[8] Where, owing to an erroneous computation as to the amount of the claim of a creditor, a personal representative has made an overpayment, he may maintain an action in his representative capacity to recover the amount overpaid,[9] and where plaintiff in a creditor's suit turns out to have been overpaid, the court has jurisdiction to order him to refund such overpayment.[10] But where a note constituting a just debt has been allowed and paid by the representative, although not presented within the time limited for presentation, all the parties believing presentation unnecessary because the note was not due when decedent died, equity will not allow a recovery against those to whom the payment was made.[11] A personal representative who on competent advice pays a claim bona fide made against the estate of his decedent, cannot afterward, upon further advice taken, recover the amount of the claim so paid upon the suggestion that the payment was made under a mistake of law.[12] Money paid out of the assets of an intestate's estate that is solvent, by one who afterward becomes administrator, in discharge of a bona fide indebtedness of the estate which the administrator would have been bound to pay in due course of administration, cannot be recovered by him.[13]

An agreement by a creditor to refund, in case the estate proves insolvent, the amount received by him in excess of the dividend to which he is entitled, is based on a sufficient consideration and may be enforced.[14] Where claimants on receiving a payment on account, agreed to hold the representative an action to recover the excess paid an unpreferred creditor long before a final settlement of the estate, that the estate was insolvent when the debt was paid. Tarplee v. Capp, 25 Ind. A. 56, 56 NE 270.

[c] Setting off improper payment.—Where through a mistake of fact, a personal representative makes a payment on a claim of a class to which there are no funds of the estate applicable, claimant should be charged with such payment when a claim for which there are assets applicable is paid him. Pinneo v. Goodspeed, 120 Ill. 524, 12 NE 196 [aff 22 Ill. A. 50].

[d] Mistake of fact or law.—An administrator having been garnished in a suit in which the attorney for the estate represented the creditor, judgment was recovered in favor of the creditor, on which an execution was issued and placed in the hands of a sheriff for service, who notified the administrator that he had an order from the county court directing payment out of the funds of the estate. The administrator thereupon consulted the attorney for the estate without knowledge that he also represented the creditor and was advised to pay the money, which he did. No such order had been in fact issued by the county court, and the attempt by garnishment, in the absence of a statute authorizing it to hold the administrator and subject the assets in his hands to the debt, was invalid. The administrator under such circumstances paid the money under a mistake of fact, and was entitled to recover it; but if the attorney acted in good faith when he advised the administrator that such an order, if issued, was valid and should be complied with, the money was then paid under a mistake of law, and was not recoverable. Thorson v. Hooper, 57 Or. 75, 109 P 388.

[e] Defenses.—It is no defense to an action to recover the excess paid an unpreferred creditor that the claims which reduced the estate to insolvency were not filed until more than fifteen months after the payment of his claim, although before final settlement of the estate; or that there was no finding that the estate had been finally settled as insolvent and that the final dividend had not been ascertained and decreed, where the evidence showed that the estate had been left open for the purpose of prosecuting actions to recover excess payments and the court's findings showed the aggregate indebtedness and assets, and the per cent that could ratably be paid. Tarplee v. Capp, 25 Ind. A. 56, 56 NE 270.

[f] Recovery limited to amount of excess.—A recovery of the entire amount paid to the creditors cannot be had, but the recovery will be limited to the difference between the amount paid and the pro rata share which the creditor would have been entitled to receive. Morris v. Porter, 87 Me. 510, 33 A 15.

[g] Imputed knowledge.—Where the amount paid to certain children from the estate of their deceased father was received by them as creditors of their father's estate, and not as heirs, they were not bound by the father's knowledge of a claim against him which was not presented as a claim against his estate, in a suit to compel such children to refund for the benefit of such creditor. Hill v. Mayes, 117 Ky. 877, 79 SW 276, 25 KyL 2023.

[h] Payment by debtor of estate.—The fact that the payment is made by a debtor of the estate at the request of the administrator is immaterial. The administrator is as much entitled to recover in such case as if he had received the money and paid it out himself. Heard v. Drake, 4 Gray (Mass.) 514 [dist Austin v. Henshaw, 7 Pick. (Mass.) 46].

[i] As between mortgage creditors the burden of contribution is upon the junior mortgagee. Hautau's Succ., 32 La. Ann. 54; Marc's Succ., 29 La. Ann. 412; Rousseau's Succ., 23 La. Ann. 1; O'Laughlin's Succ., 18 La. Ann. 142.

[j] Payment in another jurisdiction.—A curator of an insolvent estate cannot recover from a creditor of decedent, who has collected his claim from the representative of the estate in another jurisdiction, the amount so collected, for the purpose of enabling equal distribution among all creditors. Schneller v. Vance, 8 La. 506, 28 AmD 140.

[k] If the representative incurred no liability to other creditors on account of the overpayment, as where it was made after the time limited by law for the presentation of claims, he is not entitled to recover. Colegrove v. Robinson, 11 Metc. (Mass.) 238.

[l] If there was no mistake of fact in paying more than the pro rata share to which the creditor was entitled, the executor or administrator cannot recover it back from him. Beardsley v. Marsteller, 120 Ind. 319, 22 NE 315; Egbert v. Rush, 7 Ind. 706.

[m] Under the Ontario statute (1) where it appears that one creditor has received more than his pro rata share, he will be ordered to refund at the instance of other creditors. Chamberlen v. Clark, 9 Ont. A. 273 [aff 1 Ont. 135]. (2) But it seems that a personal representative cannot maintain an action to recover the excess so paid. See Leitch v. Molson's Bank, 27 Ont. 621 (where new claims were presented after the statutory time).

[a] Agreement by one of several joint creditors.—Where one of several creditors holding a joint claim against a decedent's estate at the time of receiving payments on the claim from the administrator on condition that, in case of insolvency of the estate, a refund would be made to the administrator accordingly was acting for himself as well as the other creditors, the administrator on harmless "in case said estate does not pay enough on settlement, to cover the above amount, on the claims we hold against said estate," and the claims held by such claimants were subsequently rejected, the representative was entitled to recover back the money paid.[15]

Refunding bond. Where the executors of a contractor paid the profits of a contract to his nephew, who claimed them, taking a bond to secure payment of any claims against the estate arising from the contract, the bond was sufficient to protect the estate against a judgment for personal injury caused in performing the contract, although that claim was not mentioned in the bond.[16]

[§ 1259] 15. Release by Creditors. A person having a claim against an estate may by express agreement release it,[17] and if the agreement is in writing, in construing it, the primary consideration is to arrive at the intention of the parties thereto.[18] A receipt given to a personal representative for the payment of a claim against an estate is not conclusive evidence of payment, and where payment has not in fact been made, the estate is still liable, notwithstanding the receipt;[19] but such a receipt is prima facie evidence of payment;[20] and it has been held that where a personal representative makes a settlement with a creditor by a payment pro rata upon his claim, taking a receipt in full, such receipt is conclusive unless it is shown that it was obtained by fraud, or through mistake, or upon some condition.[21]

[§ 1260] 16. Property Available for Payment[22] —a. In General. As a general rule all of the property of a decedent of whatever character is liable for the payment of his debts,[23] and where trustees with power of sale under a will conveyed the property before the administration was closed, the grantee took title subject to administration to the same extent as the grantee of a devisee,[24] and hence could not acquire title by adverse possession as against the administrator with the will annexed, so as to relieve the property from the demands of administration.[25] The debts of a decedent are charges upon the corpus of his estate and not merely upon the income,[26] although it may in certain cases be proper to apply the income to the payment the subsequent ascertainment that the estate was insolvent had the option of proceeding against the creditors either separately or jointly, and a contention in an action by the administrator to recover a portion of the sum paid on account of the insolvency of the estate that the complaint against the creditor to whom payment was made was insufficient because the other creditors were not made parties defendant was without merit. [b] Covenant in favor of one of two representatives.—Where there is a joint decree against the executors of two persons and a creditor receives a moiety of the debt from the representatives of one of them, a covenant not to levy the residue of the decree upon the estate of that one does not discharge the representatives of the other, although a release would have operated to discharge both executors. [a] Waiver of all claim in excess of a certain amount.—A stipulation in writing indorsed on a claim by which a claimant waives any claim against the estate beyond a certain sum constitutes a waiver of interest on that sum. In re Bleakley, Myr. Prob. (Cal.) 235.

[b] Agreement not releasing claim.—Where in partition between heirs, an agreement was filed whereby one of them and her husband, who also signed it, were to have one fifth of the estate, "both real and personal, after showing up the contents of such estate," for which they relinquished their claim "to all the rest of the estate" to the remaining heirs, there was no relinquishment of the husband's claim against the estate for services rendered decedent. Horne v. McRae, 53 S. C. 51, 30 SE 701.

[c] Release in full a mere receipt.—Where claimant executed a release "in full payment for all claims of said estate," without reading or having the same read to her, on the administrator representing that it was only a receipt to enable him to show the heirs what articles of personal property he had turned over to claimant, comprising articles which intestate had given to claimant in his lifetime, such release was no defense to a claim for services rendered by claimant to intestate. Harrisburg Nat. Bank v. Hiester, 2 Pearson (Pa.) 253.

[b] Stock held by an administrator of surety.—An administrator of a surety, having bank-stock certificates in his hands as such administrator when the principal debtor becomes insolvent, may and should apply on the debt for which decedent is bound as surety the value of the stock and any dividends thereon remaining in his hands. Van Winkle v. Blackford, 54 W. Va. 621, 46 SE 589.

[c] Legal assets primarily liable.—Before a creditor having a judgment against an intestate can seek satisfaction out of purely equitable assets in the hands of a stranger, he must make it appear that the estate is otherwise insufficient. Jones v. McCleod, 61 Ga. 602.

of debts and expenses in preference to the corpus.[27] Where a widow as a creditor of her husband's estate claimed a bank deposit standing in plaintiff's name, representing the income of certain land deeded by her husband to his children, with a reservation of the rents and revenues for life, which were deposited in plaintiff's name to defraud the husband's creditors, plaintiff's right to such deposit did not depend on whether the conveyances of the property and the surrender of possession thereof to plaintiff were or were not made to defraud the husband's creditors, but on whether the husband reserved to himself, at the time he deeded the land to his children, the rents and revenues from the land after the execution of the deeds.[28] Where a father deeded property to trustees to be held by them during the lifetime of his daughter, and the interest and increase to be applied to her use, and gave her the privilege of disposing of the body of the property by will, such property cannot be subjected to the payment of the daughter's debts at her death.[29]

Community property. Where a community is unliquidated and owes debts, the administration of the estate of the husband involves that of the community, and hence community property may be validly sold by the administrator of the husband's succession for the payment of community debts.[30] Where the expenses of administration are of a general nature, they should be charged pro rata on the community property and separate estate; but expenses which attach specifically to particular pieces of estate are to be charged against such pieces.[31]

Peculiar circumstances or statutory provisions may render it proper that a particular part of a decedent's estate shall be first applied to payment of his debts.[32]

[§ 1261] b. Real and Personal Property—(1) In General. The common-law rule was that the real estate of a decedent could not be subjected to payment of his debts unless such debts were specifically charged thereon by his will;[33] but under the modern law of administration the rule is otherwise, and the whole estate, real as well as personal, is subject to the payment of debts,[34] and the rule in

[a] Illustration.—A testator, while managing his factory building upon his land, had contracted certain debts for coal supplied to him by complainants in carrying on his factory business. By his will he directed the business to be continued after his death under the management of his son, and appointed him, with two others, his executors. His son and his executors continued the business after his death, and contracted debts for coal furnished the factory by complainants to carry on the business. That the latter debts, the executors having defaulted in their payment, were under well-settled principles chargeable, in equity, as liens against the land, but that the debts contracted by the testator for the coal furnished before his death were payable out of the general assets of his estate, for the collection of which complainants have an adequate remedy at law. Paul v. Wilson, 79 N. J. Eq. 204, 81 A 835.

[b] General estate before property subject to appointment.—Testator created a trust in a share of real property in favor of his daughter F and provided that, upon the death of the survivor of his two daughters, the share should go to F's appointees by deed or by will, or, in default of such appointment, to her heirs. F by her will created a trust covering all property subject to her disposal by will to continue during her grandniece's life, with remainder to the grandniece's issue. Although as to F's creditors and purchaser she became the owner of the fee of the share devised by testator under her power of appointment, in the absence of any question raised by a creditor or purchaser arising out of such relation, she having died, her debts should be paid out of her own general estate, and not out of the estate over which she had power of appointment, the amount of her debts being small as compared with her estate, which consisted wholly of personalty. Farmers' L. & T. Co. v. Kip, 192 N. Y. 266, 85 NE 59 [aff 120 App. Div. 347, 104 NYS 1092].

[c] Intestate estate first.—Under the statutes which provide that, if testator by his will designates the estate to be appropriated for the payment of debts and administration expenses, they must be paid out of the appropriated estate so far as it is sufficient, and that, if the estate appropriated is insufficient, any portion of the estate not disposed of by will must be appropriated for that purpose, where a testator disposes of only part of his estate by will, and makes no provision for the payment of debts and expenses, they must be paid out of the intestate estate. In re Travers, 145 Cal. 508, 78 P 1058.

[d] Property specifically devised or bequeathed belongs to the class of property to be resorted to last for the payment of debts. In re Bragg, 166 Cal. 103, 134 P 1140.

this respect is not affected by the fact that the personalty was originally sufficient to pay the debts, but has been lost or become depreciated in value by reason of the wrongful or negligent acts or omissions of the personal representative.[35] With regard to what constitutes realty and what personalty, it may be laid down as a general rule that no part of an estate is personal property which was not such at the death of the owner,[36] although of course this rule may be affected by testamentary provisions by which realty is converted into personalty.[37]

[a] Real estate is legal "assets" for the payment of a decedent's debts after the personalty is exhausted. Best v. Spooner, 4 KyL 602.

[b] The legislature has power to subject the lands of a person to the payment of his debts, to the exclusion of the personal property. Watkins v. Holmon, 16 Pet. (U. S.) 25, 10 L. ed. 873.

[c] Land cannot be applied until widow's dower assigned.—Hill v. Mitchell, 5 Ark, 608.

[d] A direction by testator that all his debts be duly paid charges such debts on the real estate. McKinley v. Coe, 66 N. J. Eq. 70, 57 A 1030.

[e] Sale of realty necessary.—Real estate is not assets for the payment of the debts of a decedent until it has been sold and the proceeds received by the administrator. Vaughn v. Deloatch, 65 N. C. 378. Sales under order of court see infra §§ 1438–1741.

[f] Although the time has expired within which creditors can apply for a sale of real estate to pay debts, yet, if there is a deficiency in the personal estate, debts and funeral expenses are payable out of the surplus proceeds of real estate previously sold on foreclosure. Matter of Callaghan, 69 Hun 161, 23 NYS 378.

[g] The proceeds of a sale of mortgaged property under executory process outside the succession are bound to contribute to the costs of administration, where there is no other fund available, and to the payment of privileged claims, such as that of a widow in necessitous circumstances and the claims of the last illness and funeral of the mortgagor. Finegan's Succ., 135 La. 473, 65 S 614.

[h] Debts incurred in connection with realty.—Where an executor deposited proceeds of a sale of realty under a power of sale, in his own name, and used part of the proceeds for payment of taxes and for repairs on his individual realty, and his executors sold the realty, the proceeds of such sale is chargeable with the amount so appropriated by decedent executor, in favor of the estate of which he was executor, the amount paid for taxes with interest at six per cent from the time of payment to date of sale of the land, and the amount disbursed for repairs without interest. Mattery of Clark, 69 Misc. 527, 127 NYS 888, 8 Mills Surr. 7 (holding, also, that disbursements made by the executor from such deposit for coal and electric light for tenants and for fire insurance of his individual realty are chargeable to the income from such realty and not to the proceeds of the sale thereof, the estate of which he was executor standing only as an unsecured creditor).

[i] Promise to pay out of personalty.—Where for a valuable consideration one promises to pay a debt out of his personal estate at his death, without a specific limitation to that estate alone, if the personal estate proves insufficient, the real estate may be resorted to. Judy v. Louderman, 48 Oh. St. 562, 29 NE 181.

[j] Consent of representative to sale by heir.—An administrator cannot, by consenting to the sale of land by the heir, divest the creditor of his right to have his debt made out of such land, although it might create an estoppel against him, if the right of creditors was not affected. Moncrief v. Moncrief, 73 Ind. 587.

[k] Selection of particular tract.—A general creditor, asserting no lien upon any portion of decedent's land, cannot select a particular tract, and subject it to the payment of his debt. Hundley v. Taylor, 25 SW 887, 15 KyL 808.

[l] Where funds used for benefit of realty.—Where an executor who is also a trustee under the will has used funds in his hands to keep down the interest upon encumbrances upon a portion of the trust property and for repairs of the same instead of applying such funds in payment of the debts, equity will charge such premises in favor of the creditors to the extent of the amount so laid out upon them. Ferris v. Van Vechten, 9 Hun (N. Y.) 12.

[m] Where an executor who is sole devisee under a will sells decedent's lands as devisee, he receives the proceeds as executor and must apply the same to the payment of decedent's debts if the personal estate is insufficient for that purpose. Hocking Valley R. Co. v. White, 87 Oh. St. 413, 101 NE 354, AnnCas1914A 190.

[o] Debts of a decedent are not necessarily a charge on his land, since they may be barred by limitations or the land be exempt from debt. Mayer v. Kornegay, 163 Ala. 371, 50 S 880, 136 AmSR 79.

[p] When contribution pro rata proper.—McLearn v. Wallace, 10 Pet. (U. S.) 625, 9 L. ed. 558; Farnum v. Bascom, 122 Mass. 282; Wootering v. Stewart, 2 Yeates (Pa.) 483.

[q] Remedy of heir.—If, by the fault of the executor or administrator in not collecting personal estate, or in not applying it to the payment of debts, lands are taken from the heir or devisee, the representative is liable to the person injured in an action of waste. Mitchel v. Lunt, 4 Mass. 654.

[r] Debts contracted by an administrator are never a charge upon the lands of his intestate. Mayer v. Kornegay, 163 Ala. 371, 50 S 880, 136 AmSR 79.

36. Winants v. Terhune, 15 N. J. Eq. 185.

[a] Money arising from a sale of realty is equitable assets. Cloudas v. Adams, 4 Dana (Ky.) 603.

[b] Direction to sell to pay specified debts.—Where an executor was ordered by a will to sell real estate to pay debts for which the testator was surety, and after such payment the balance was to be given to a daughter-in-law, the proceeds of the sale after payment of such debts was not personal property applicable to the payment of debts of the estate before a resort could be had to the realty. Winants v. Terhune, 15 N. J. Eq. 185.

[c] Direction to sell lands and invest proceeds.—Where a will authorized the executor to sell testator's lands and invest the proceeds in securities, or purchase other lands therewith, and provided that such proceeds should always be considered as real estate, creditors of the deceased could not subject the proceeds to payment of their claims as personal property, but could follow them only in equity. Mayer v. McCune, 59 How Pr (N. Y.) 78.

[d] A judicial sale of decedent's realty will not convert it into personalty, and an application to the supreme court by a creditor for payment of the surplus must be founded on an order of the surrogate for the sale of such realty, and payment of the applicant's demand. Hoey v. Kinney, 10 AbbPr (N. Y.) 400.

37. See generally Wills [40 Cyc 2065–2076].

The general rule as to the order in which a decedent's property is liable for the payment of his debts is that the personal estate must be first applied, and then the realty,[38] and the application of the rule in a particular case is not prevented by the fact that it will result in depriving legatees of

"It is a well-settled principle, that in the administration of assets the personal estate is the natural and primary fund for the payment of debts and legacies, and, as a general rule, must first be exhausted before the real estate can be made liable." Sutherland v. Harrison, 86 Ill. 363, 365 [quot Schade v. Connor, 84 Nebr. 51, 56, 120 NW 1012]. To same effect Baldwin v. Alexander, 145 Ala. 186, 40 S 391; Farmers' L. & T. Co. v. Kip, 192 N. Y. 266, 85 NE 59 [aff 120 App. Div. 347, 104 NYS 1092 (aff 52 Misc. 407, 102 NYS 137)].

[a] An antenuptial contract is a charge on the personal estate and real estate is not subject to it. Pitkin v. Peet, 108 Iowa 480, 79 NW 272.

[b] The cost of improvements to the real estate which are necessary and proper to adapt the premises to the requirements of business, and which result in an increased income to the widow, is properly charged and allowed out of the personal estate. Culp's Est., 5 Phila. (Pa.) 97.

[c] When income of realty properly applicable.—Where personal estate is insufficient, and during the contest over the probate of the will the income of the realty has accumulated as a fund in the executors' hands, and there are controversies between legatees and devisees, the debts may be paid from the fund, and the legatees and devisees be left to settle their disputes before a competent tribunal. Skidmore v. Romaine, 2 Bradf. Surr. (N. Y.) 122.

[d] Foreign assets.—An action in one state by a judgment creditor of an insolvent corporation organized in that state against the widow and the sole heir of a deceased stockholder to enforce his personal liability to the extent of the value of land in such state inherited by the widow cannot be defeated by showing that there are personal assets of decedent's estate in another state sufficient to pay plaintiff's claim. Cooper v. Ives, 62 Kan. 395, 63 P 434.

[e] Obligation of support charged on land.—Where a deed made by a father to his son in pursuance to a previous agreement recited that "for, and in consideration of two hundred dollars, and the faithful maintenance" of the grantor's wife, the grantor "hath given and granted unto the said" grantee "a certain tract of land, to have and to hold," etc., the maintenance of the grantor's wife was not a charge upon the personalty of the estate of the grantee, decedent, in the hands of his administrator, but a charge upon the land sold in the hands of the grantee's heirs. Laxton v. Tilly, 66 N. C. 327.
